PITTSFIELD, Mass. (AP) — One of seven young Lenox men jailed for a high school graduation party fight that ended in the drowning of two youths from a neighboring town will be paroled Monday, officials confirmed Thursday.

Jim McCarthey, a spokesman for the state parole board, said the seven, now ranging in age from 19 to 21, were all granted parole following hearings on October 18. The first to be released is Joseph Burke, 20, who is scheduled to be paroled on Monday, McCarthey said.

Burke, now married and the father of a son, has been working for the past several weeks at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony, as a carpenter and maintenance man under a jail work release program.

Bruce Kern, 21, is scheduled for parole on Dec. 12; Peter Bianco, Mark Hinman, Steven Piretti, and Todd Terpak, all 20, are to be released Jan. 9 and Robert Walker, 21, is scheduled to be paroled Jan. 16, McCarthey said.

The seven have been held in the Berkshire County jail since April 15, when Superior Court Judge William Simons sentenced them to 18-month terms for assault and battery.

PVTA bus service extended

By MARY ANNE BEEN
Collegian Staff

Articles proposed to extend PVTA bus service, to introduce a "Peeping Tom" by-law and to work towards the lowering of sulfur emissions were passed earlier this week at the Amherst town meeting.

Town Meeting voted Tuesday to allow the Amherst Board of Selectmen to accept a gift of $2,346 from Dennis Jones, owner of Mill Hollow Apartments, to extend PVTA bus service past his property to the Cushman area of town.

The Cushman extension has actually been in operation since Oct. 17, according to Edith Wilkenson, chair of the Selectboard.

"People are saying that the extension is working," Wilkenson said. "We are experiencing an increased ridership."

Jones' grant will provide service for one year and the Select Board is authorized to accept future gifts.

The Board of Selectmen also passed a "Peeping Tom" by-law entitled, Entering Property to Commit Certain Acts Prohibited, which states that no person shall enter the premises of another for the purpose of committing any wanton or malicious act and/or for the purpose of invading the privacy of another by peeping into property or spying upon any person. The fine for each offense was raised to $300, up from $200 as proposed in the article.

The article also says nothing contained in the by-law shall be construed to limit in any way the right of a police officer to enter upon private property to perform necessary official duties.

"We tried to work this by-law so as to make it clear and concise," Wilkenson said. "We want the community, the police and those people who engage in this type of activity to understand our intent. This by-law supplements state laws."

The Massachusetts Public Interest Group submitted a petition that requested the Board to write to the Governor of the Commonwealth and the U.S. Congress to work towards a state-wide cap on sulfur emissions

Child care a woman's right

By REBECCA THATCHER
Collegian Staff

The United States has to change its attitude toward child care in order to adequately meet the needs of women, Mary Wentworth, former University of Massachusetts Everywoman's Center employee, said yesterday in the Campus Center.

In a lecture sponsored by the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA), titled "Is the U.S. Behind Child Care?", Wentworth said, "child care is a critical issue in the U.S. today because the provisions for the care of children have enormous impact on society."

Wentworth, who ran unsuccessfully against Silvio Conte (D-Mass) for the House of Representatives in 1982, said the lack of a national child care policy in this country makes it difficult for women to go to school and receive benefits and pensions from their jobs.

The United States is the only developed country in the world that does not believe that child care is a woman's right.

"We are really in the bottom of the barrel (as far as child care is concerned)" she said.

Wentworth said East Germany and Sweden have successful child care programs because they have a national policy stating, "children are a social responsibility and not an individual responsibility."

She said children have been adversely affected by the lack of a national child care policy because without child care centers each home has to function as a child care center in itself.

"The general social-economic nature of the home determines how good that center is," she said.

Wentworth said day care centers that

Child care is a critical issue in the US today because the provisions for the care of children have enormous impact on society, have been established are insufficient because they do not serve the needs of women.

–Mary Wentworth–formerly of the EveryWomen's Center

"The child care centers of this country have been designed to meet the needs of the children, not those of the mother," she said.

When women want to put their children in day care, they often find that centers have limited space and hours and unaffordable rates, she said.

Man charged with assault

The victim of a stabbing incident outside the Village Inn on Amity Street last month was charged Wednesday with assault and battery with a dangerous weapon in connection with an alleged beating at the same location.

The 21-year-old Pelham man allegedly "stomped" another man with his shod foot, which was the dangerous weapon. This was the third incident of assualt and battery near the Village Inn (formerly the Drake) this semester.

In other police action:

A 25-year-old Sunderland man was arrested Monday night and charged with being a disorderly person. Amherst Police said they responded to several calls about a woman screaming at 9:05 p.m. The man was allegedly "harassing his former girlfriend," police said.

Two bicycles were reported stolen from a Brittany Manor storage area at 1:30 p.m. Tuesday. A red Motobecane 10-speed, valued at $350, and a black, 12-speed Fuji Gran Tour, valued at $210, were reported missing, along with the chains and locks that secured them.

A 16-year-old was charged Wednesday with possession of a dangerous weapon, a pair of nun-chuks. Amherst Police said they were the second such martial arts weapon they confiscated this week.

Illegal aliens fraudulently obtain financial aid

By SHEILA DONAHUE
Collegian Correspondent

Approximately 210 illegal aliens have been indicted on charges of fraudently obtaining nearly one million dollars worth of financial aid this year, a U.S. Department of Education newsletter reported this week.

Inspector General James B. Thomas, Jr. said losses from the four programs - Pell Grants, Supplemental Opportunity Grants, National Direct Student Loans, and Guaranteed Student Loans - have caused an increased nationwide initiative to identify and prosecute ineligible aliens.

The most recent investigations of alleged ineligible students was completed in the beginning of October and resulted in charges being brought against 36 persons located in Illinois, New York and Colorado. These individuals, 16 of whom were aliens, had fraudently obtained $170,000.

Arthur Jackson, director of the Office of Financial Aid, said the University of Massachusetts has encountered students attempting to obtain funds illegally.

Jackson says that there is a very small population of students who have attempted to receive falsely obtained aid. "We are very, very quick and direct to correct them. Normally we don't have to, but we don't hesitate to report students...They are liable for civil and criminal charges, and possibly expulsion from school, for false statements on admission and financial aid applications."

"This initiative which identifies abuse and wrongdoing in the student assistance programs, should help in maintaining integrity in these programs and assure American taxpayers that their money is properly spent," Thomas said.

Jackson said that at UMass, "visa classifications are checked to see who are eligible residents," and that "we receive the student's parents' 1040 tax statement," which resolves any doubt as to eligibility. He also says that "it is a very serious matter. Students should provide only the correct information."

According to the newsletter, the most common means used by ineligible aliens to obtain student loans or grants is to fraudulently claim to be U.S. citizens or eligible non-citizens. The Office of the Inspector General works with other Federal agencies, including the Immigration and Naturalization Service, the Depratment of Justice and the FBI, as well as state and local authorities, to locate and bring charges against the students. Many Federal, state and local courts are seeking restitution of the fraudulently obtained funds.

GSS condemns U.S. invasion

By SEAN CASEY
Collegian Staff

After a lengthy debate last night, the University of Massachusetts Graduate Student Senate (GSS) passed a resolution condemning the U.S. invasion of Grenada and urging the removal of U.S. troops.

The motion, which passed ten to six with four abstentions, states: "The GSS condemns the U.S. invasion of Grenada. We believe that all troops should be immediately withdrawn from that independent nation."

The motion was first presented at last week's senate meeting, but was tabled until this week because many senators felt they should speak to their constituencies before voting while still others questioned the senate's function in discussing "Political" issues.

A committee was formed to formulate a definition of political issues which will be debated at next week's meeting. The definition could produce a policy which, according to senate President Sanjiv Dugal, could be incorporated into the senate's by-laws.

Senators who did take organized votes among their constituencies showed that opinions on the issue varied between different departments. Of 30 students responding to a vote taken in the 110 student graduate Chemistry Department, 68 percent opposed the revolution, 14 percent supported it, and 14 percent abstained from the vote. Senators from the International Education and Economics departments said that all the students they spoke with in their departments supported the motion, however.

A senator from the department of Veterinary and Animal Science said that, out of 18 students attending a departmental meeting, 16 voted for abstaining on the motion on the grounds that the senate is not a "Political body."

"In our department, there seemed to be a strong feeling that the issue shouldn't be handled in the senate," said John M. Morgan, a senator from the Chemistry Department.

Caucus urges vocalization

By LYNN PERKINS
Collegian Correspondent

As part of the Student Government Association (SGA) Undergraduate Student Senate, the Women's Caucus meets to insure a women's perspective on Senate-related issues and to encourage women to be more vocal at meetings.

Dianne Arico, co-chair of the Women's Caucus, said caucus meetings will be "for women in the Senate in order for them to feel more comfortable and understand the issues, so that they will speak up." Women tend to be less vocal because of socialization and sexism, she said.

Although the university has an almost equal number of men and women, only one-third of 116 senate members are women.

"The number of women has dropped drastically in the Senate and it is frightening," she said.

Arico said she would like to see the caucus become a social bond between women. She said she hopes that through the caucus, women senators will look forward to sitting in on Senate meetings and not feel intimidated.

Arico said she would like to insure a women's perspective on every issue in the Senate. "The caucus will serve as an information session, so the women will know about the issues," she said. However, she said it is important that the information sessions do not lead to debate.

All women senators are automatically members of the caucus, but very few are active participants. To increase participation in the caucus, it will focus on issues of concern to all women, such as lighting on campus, rape, and sexual harassment procedures. This will create unity and draw women into the caucus, she said.

The caucus has existed for over ten years, but it has not been consistently strong. Membership is not limited to only women senators. It is open to all university women.

BOG to seek cost waiver

By RALPH ROBERTS
Collegian Correspondent

Student fees at the University of Massachusetts will rise more than $10 next semester if the Board of Governors fail to receive a $330,000 cost waiver from the UMass Board of Trustees, according to BOG Chair Mike Reilly.

The Campus Center deck floor, located directly over the Concourse, is in desperate need of repair, thanks to the original architect's mistakes, as more than 18 leaks in the building have been reported, Reilly said.

"If we don't get the cost waiver, then we'll just have to raise student fees, because these repairs can't be put off much longer. Putting buckets under all the leaks just isn't an efficient solution to our problem," Reilly said.

As of 1983, the university issued a "full-costing" program totaling $1.2 million across campus. This amount is the cost from the physical plant to other UMass buildings for services rendered.

As a result, each of the fee-based trust funds including the Campus Center, Dining Commons and dormitories, have all had to "tighten their financial belts."

"We're just starting to feel the affects of the new program and it seems that sources for excess financial backing are less flexible now," Reilly said.

If the BOG receives the waiver, it would then take out a bond for 10 to 15 years.

New computer installed

By MARJORIE MOONEY
Collegian Correspondent

A new computer system recently installed at the University of Massachusetts Registrar's office will update the 22-year-old in-house system, according to Registrar Ralph Jones.

"The new computer will have increased storage capacity and be able to process information more rapidly," Jones said.

Jones said the new computer system will bring about "a major historical change from pen and quill to electronics," meaning that now the records will be stored in the computer instead of being written up and kept in file cabinets. It will also provide added convenience - "now students will be able to retrieve 'complete' copies of their records in the overnight process," Jones said.

Jones explained there are four "levels" to this new system: the General Study Data, providing student address and identification number, the Branch Data which provides more detailed information on the student, a Subsystem supplying facts concerning the student's major, and finally the General Term covering course data and whether or not the student is on exchange.

"The beauty of this system is that each level is expandable, unlike the old system which had reached its saturation point and lacked room for modification, enhancement or addition of new processes," Jones said.

The funding for this computer will come from budget aquisition funds, more specifically from the allotment of the Data Processing Center.

The overall cost of the computer and the software system is difficult to estimate because besides the initial cost, two and a half years of work by a development crew, should be taken into account, Jones added.

Jones said this Data Base is only the first step in modernizing the University Computer system, the next will be revisions in the class scheduling system.

Benefit dinner to be held Sunday, Nov. 6

The Club Managers Association of America, an HRTA organization at the University of Massachusetts will hold an all-you-can-eat spaghetti dinner this Sunday from 6 p.m. to 11 p.m. on the 10th floor of the Campus Center. All profits from this benefit will go to the Juvenile Diabetes Foundation.

Spaghetti with sauce and/or cheese, a salad bar, bread and choice of dessert will be served. There will also be a cash bar, and a circulating violinist.

BRAINSTORM is a headache

BRAINSTORM
Directed by Douglas Trumball
Mountain Farms 4

By JOE SHARTRAND
Collegian Correspondent

Douglas Trumball's Brainstorm is not just a bad movie, it's an insult to our intelligence. Trumball expects us to swallow a series of boring cliches as an excuse for a plot. There are so many time-worn truisms in this film, about Dr. Michael Brace (Christopher Walker) and his thought recorder, that the special effects are the only thing worth looking forward to.

The climax is the most disappointing cliche of them all, for it shows little white angels flying toward a very bright light, like moths to a light-bulb. This is the most dehumanizing, trite and sophomoric portrayal of heaven that a filmaker could use. After attempting to build up our expectations about the recorded thoughts of a heart attack victim, Trumball veers away from any controversial ideas of death and throws up this obsolete idea of little white angels flitting around the sky. How interesting it would have been if Dr. Brace had played the death tape on his thought machine and, as the woman died, the tape had gone black! What a scary ending that would have been, instead of the sloppy sentimental ending with Dr. Brace glimpsing heaven and coming back to tell his wife about it.

The characters don't help the plot any because they end up as predictable, unrealistic stereotypes. Dr. Brace is nothing but the embodiment of all goodness and niceness and when he goes back to his former wife, (Natalie Wood) after his present girlfriend dies, their relationship becomes almost heavenly. These two main characters are the focal point of everything that goes on, so how can they further the storyline when they have no depth as human beings? Every person in this film is either nice, or mean; good, or evil; smart, or stupid. None were a combination of both and as a result no audience can get close to these cardboard cut-out characters.

The special effects are meant to awe us into admiration, but the characters and plot are so dull and unoriginal that the special effects are not very exciting, either. As it stands, with its cliched events and pointless special effects, Brainstorm is nothing more than an insult to the paying moviegoer who at least expects some entertainment, if not something a little thought provoking, from a four dollar film.

Bar provides link to the past

By RICH BRUNELLI
Collegian Staff

A reggae band is set to play downstairs. Two groups of men are arguing over the rules of a game of pool. Twenty-one folks are bellied up to a bar that nearly spans the entire main room. And if atmosphere and character are at all important to drinking establishments, Sheehans Cafe is a fine one.

Sheehan's, on Pleasant St. in Northampton, along with Dewey's Pub (downstairs) is a bar that caters to a certain mysterious link in the past.

It is a concept bar. Although Sheehan's has been around for 82 years, no one is quite sure when or where the mahogany woodwork came from. As with most secrets of the past, the facts are handed down through hearsay and rumour. This is true of Sheehan's. Assistant manager Liz Benson believes that the hand-crafted wooden interior was always here, and simply refurbished. But rumour has it that the woodwork was shipped over from France around the turn of the century. In any case, the true history remains clouded, which lends a certain mystique to the bar.

In the long main room Sheehan's has much of the Ragtime era about it. There is the tall, strong woodworking, with massive mirrors set into it.

There are the sculpted ceiling tiles with whirring ceiling fans suspended from it. There are stained glass windows and huge hanging plants. And there is an antique National cash register that must be cranked, but according to Benson, "Still works."

Underneath Sheehan's proper is Dewey's Pub - here the clientele is catered to in more contemporary fashion. Dewey's is more compact than upstairs and is; therefore, usually more crowded. From Monday to Saturday Sheehan's stages various acts in Dewey's. On Mondays it's a sock hop which Benson says is always a good draw. On Wednesdays it's one of the Valley's premiere bands, Urban Renewal. Some other acts that will be booked in the near future are Heroes in Trouble, and Fast Ed's Fabulous Heavyweights - a corpulant comedy band.

Sheehan's boasts no cover charge for any of their entertainment, and two for one Happy Hour on Friday from 4 to 6 and Wednesday from 8 to 10.

Nostalgia is to some extent fun for everyone. And at Sheehan's like the old National cash register, it still works.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

I want to know who'll stop the rain

As she walked toward the Student Union the raindrops began to fall. It was a grey day on campus and the sky was an endless blanket of clouds. The horizon could not be seen though there was no doubt that it was out there. The earth was soft, the air misty, and the pavement started to darken as the raindrops raced to get space on the ground.

Approaching the pond she heard a static-filled radio tell its audience that the "...nuclear arms race escalated today as,..." some country or another increased their military arsenal. The rain on the pond made rippling rings that spread, one after the other. As drops fell close to each other the rings collided, yet without hesitation formed new rings.

Taara Eden Hoffman

She arrived at the Student Union and bought a newspaper. A major story described the "U.S. invasion and securing of Grenada." She read about the 1900 troops that infiltrated the small island and wondered if it was raining there, too.

Walking toward the Student Post Office she put a "World Peace" stamp on the letter she was about to mail. Her best friend was stationed at Okinawa with the United States Marine Corps and letters were his only connection with peace and security. His company was one of the next few that was being sent to Beirut and she felt her stomach tighten as she posted and mailed his piece of "peace".

The pools of water outside flow into each other as the people of the University busied themselves with their day's events.

She preferred not to remain at the Student Union and after a long day decided to head home. On the way out she noticed the "Union Video" television surrounded by a group of people. On the screen were military personnel in camouflage jumping out of helicopters. The arms they were carrying seemed to weigh as much as the "boys" themselves. The scene switched to a wooded area with soldiers hiding in trees. The title of the program slowly appeared: "El Salvador -- Another Vietnam?". It was raining in those woods.

The rain had eased a bit and now there was a constant, light shower. The clouds were higher in the sky though it was still as dark as before. She quickened her pace and sheltered her hands in her pockets for warmth. Her newspaper caught some rain and a few edges curled with the weight of the water.

Nearing her room she saw bulletins announcing a toxic waste dump site that was to be established in the region in the near future. Grafitti for and against the establishment covered the bulletins as well as the cement posts they were attached to. The rain had smeared the ink the messages were marked with.

When she got to her building a T.V. was on in a room near hers. A broadcaster was giving recent information on the situation in Lebanon. The picture then showed an interview with the family of one of the more than 230 Marine and Navy personnel thast had been killed in the explosion there.

She went to her room and saw that the rain had sprayed some of her plants on the windowsill because of a window she left open.

She looked past the raindrop-covered glass and as the sun finally peaked through the clouded blanket she started to cry.

Animal rights misunderstood

Animal rights" is a term often misconstrued by the public. To most people concerned with this subject, animals have the right to be treated humanely and to not be exploited by humans. Humans do not have the right to inflict undue suffering on animals. "Animal rights" does not mean that animals deserve "better" treatment than humans.

As a member of the Animal Rights Coalition, I have noticed that people think that to grant animals rights means to take away certain rights from humans. It is not the goal of the Animal Rights Coalition to pit animals against humans; we simply want people to be aware of how they often unwittingly inflict suffering on other species. Animal rights activists question humankind's use of other species and try to end many of the cruelties that go on in factory farming and scientific laboratories.

Lisa Borders

Animal rights is not necessarily anti-vivisection (live animal experimentation) or pro-vegetarian. As a zoology major, I have had classes where experimentation on animals was a necessary part of my education. But I have also attended labs where I felt that animals were wasted in experiments whose main point could have been taught in a different manner. Neither I nor the Animal Rights Coalition preaches vegetarianism; we simply advocate more humane treatment and better living conditions for animals destined for the slaughterhouse.

On commercial chicken farms, for example, three to five hens are routinely kept in cages no larger than an album cover. Because they have no room to move, their feet often grow around the wire of the cages; when they are removed for slaughter, their feet must be cut from the cages. These animals are raised using commercial assembly line methods, hence the term "factory farming."

One of the more publicized cruelties of factory farming occurs in veal production. Veal calves are kept in constant darkness, in stalls so small that they cannot turn around or even stretch out. So that their meat will remain white, they are fed an iron-deficient liquid diet with no roughage, thus stifling the animal's natural urge to 'ruminate' (chew its cud). This inability to chew causes digestive disorders, including stomach ulcers, in veal calves.

Cosmetics and drugs must be tested on animals in this country, and many of these toxicity tests are excessive and cruel. In the Draize test, rabbits' eyes are held open in mechanical devices so that concentrated amounts of a substance, such as shampoo, can be dripped into the eyes. The strength of the substance is measured by the amount of damage done to the eye.

The standard test for toxicity of a chemical is the "Lethal Dosage 50" or LD-50 test. This test determines the dosage level at which 50 percent of the test animals will die. It is used for a variety of substances, even fairly harmless ones; therefore enormous quantities of the substance have to be force-fed to the animals. In these cases death is caused by the high concentration given to the animal, and has no relevance to the circumstances in which humans will use the substance.

We tend to think of ourselves as a species of superior intelligence, and that this intelligence sets us apart from other animals. As intelligent beings, it is our responsibility not to abuse those less fortunate -- and that includes animals.

In order for us to consider ourselves a just and civilized people, we must show compassion for other species as well as for members of our own. We should be able to co-exist with all other species, and it is this goal toward which the Animal Rights Coalition works.

Lisa Borders is co pres. of the Animal Rights Coalition

You freeze or you boil

To the Editor,

Well folks, the heating season is officially upon us. Sometimes in the wee morning hours of October the first, as mandated by our great and powerful General Court, they turned it on, like it or not.

Now we, the proud recipients of the Physical Plant Management System, can enjoy the invigorating and life sustaining temperature differences that make this a five-star university. Why, just this morning I was blessed enough to have a class in that architectural wonder, Goessman Hall. There I found shelter from the skin-eating early October cold. My auditorium, with its five radiators hissing industriously for my comfort and warmth, was eighty-five degrees.

I know what you are thinking, you are thinking: "But that only represents a temperature difference of less than twenty degrees!!" Indeed, I did barely break into a skin-moistening sweat. But soon, it will be November and then December with forty, fifty and even sixty degree differences between inside and outside temperatures.

What will it be like in these colder months? Imagine my stimulation as I venture from freezing cold to margarine-melting heat. No longer will I be robbed of my inalienable right to sweat in class. No matter how fast I strip winter parka, vest, over-shirt, gloves, hat and scarf from my warming flesh, my boots and socks alone shall ensure the moistening of my skin.

After class, with coat in hand, hat in my pocket and gloves left behind, I face the cold Northwest wind and skip happily to my next class.

Then I shall get a cold, a most wonderful cold. I will experience my joints as never before and my sinuses shall excrete precious bodily fluids for all to examine and marvel at. My newly resonant voice will be the envy of all. I shall visit the infirmary, the climax of any cold. To dizzily see the clean modern halls, to fill out the pretty green and white computer forms, to follow the soothing fat black arrows to the office of the Nurse-Practitioner and to receive her diagnosis, "You have a cold," and her palliative, "take some aspirin, and, David, don't go into the cold with wet skin..."

Both sides should be heard

To the Editor,

The demonstration by students in support of the Grenada invasion is a heartening development. It should help restore to the campus some of the political vitality of yesteryear.

In the 1950's, the McCarthyites held sway and dampened political activism and the exchange of views so vital to intellectual life. We seldom, if ever, heard a radical left critique of American politics.

In 1968, Hubert Humphrey was unable to speak at the University of Massachusetts and in 1983 Jeanne Kirkpatrick was unable to speak at Smith College. In the intervening years the political right was as effectively blocked from the campus as the left in the 1950's. The cost to the campus of barring the right has been identical to the cost of banning the left. The political life of the campus has been increasingly dull and dreary. The establishment left has blamed "student apathy", whereas the real reason is that when dissent is dampened and all that is recited is the establishment left line, the brighter students turn to more meaningful and interesting pursuits. And the activist left residue becomes intellectually lazy and mentally flabby. Witness the description in The Collegian by an establishment reporter of the pro-invasion students as "militaristic" and the rejoinder of an establishment S.G.A. member to anti-left criticisms that they "stink."

Let us hope that dissent of every kind will return to the campus and that we will once again enjoy a lively and yeasty political environment, where minds are sharpened and quickened by disagreement.

Sorry about phone books

To the Editor,

Apologies to individuals, students especially, who were unable to obtain a copy of the Student Telephone Directory. We did not anticipate the high demand for this publication when we first bid the contract in 1982 -- for three editions of 12,000 each. Effective with the Spring 1984 edition and two semesters following, the contract calls for 15,000 copies, which, we trust, will meet everyone's needs. Thank you.

Black Affairs

Black presidential candidate splits community

The debate around a Black presidential candidate for 1984 has split the Black community largely but not excusively on class lines.

Poor people, blue collar and low to middle income workers overwhelmingly endorse a Black revolt within the Democratic Party. Most Black middle class leaders of the NAACP and Urban League, on the other hand, have denounced the idea as a "hoax" and a "fraud."

The majority of Black elected officials and particularly the mayors of major cities have already jumped aboard Mondale's bandwagon, along with the AFL-CIO bureaucracy. Even Atlanta mayor Andrew Young, one of Jesse's closest friends, states that "Blacks ought to be in any campaign where the candidate is likely to be elected president."

The immediate cause for debate revolves around Jessee Jackson's strengths and weaknesses as a candidate. But the more fundamental issue--which no one is discussing--is the fact that the Black community is nowhere nearly as culturally, economically, or socially cohesive as it was during the period of Jim Crow thirty years ago.

One viewpoint on our recent history is that Blacks have achieved a tremendous degree of success. In Birmingham, Alabama, only twenty years ago, police chief "Bull" Connor unleashed dogs and levied clubs and firehoses against passive Black protestors. Today the mayor of Birmingham is a Black progressive, Richard Arrington.

In September, 1968, Andrew Young was arrested for blocking sanitation trucks during a stike of black garbage workers. Four years later he was elected to Congress, and today he is the mayor of Atlanta.

Less than a decade ago Howard Fuller was leader of the revolutionary Malcolm X College in North Carolina. Late last year Fuller became a cabinet member and top Black administrator to the governor of Wisconsin. During the Cold war Coleman Young was the radical executive secretary of the Communist-dominated National Negro labor Council. For almost a decade, he has been the mayor of Detroit.

Marion Berry, currently mayor of Washington, D.C., first became involved in policies two decades ago as a militant leader of the Student Non-violent Coordinating Committee.

Superficially, the sheer numbers of Blacks moving into positions of political and economic power seem to validate the myth of American cultural pluralism and democracy. The number of Blacks elected officials nationwide jumped from 103 in 1964 to 5,003 in 1980. The number of Blacks in Congress increased from 5 in 1964 to 21 in 1983

A generation ago, the "Black bourgeoisie" consisted primarily of school teachers, postal workers, and skilled workmen. Most Black businesses consisted of "mom and pop" grocery stores, barber shops, and funeral parlors. With the passage of federal legislation promoting affirmative action and civil rights, opportunities for racial development were created in both the public and private sector.

Tastes like it never left Germany.

Steinhäuser Bier has authentic German taste. It is brewed and bottled in Germany according to the Purity Law of 1516, which allows only natural ingredients. Then Steinhäuser is shipped to America. Unchanged. Uncompromised. Next time you're thirsting for authentic German beer, ask for a Steinhäuser, the one beer that tastes like it never left Germany.

Stickers host top-ranked UConn in big matchup

By JILL LANG
Collegian Staff

For some athletic teams, the season ends with the last game. For the fifth ranked University of Massachusetts field hockey team, however, the last game of the season marks a new beginning...the beginning of another season.

Tomorrow, the stickers will close out their regular season with a home game against arch-rival Connecticut, currently ranked first in the country, on NOPE field at 11 a.m. According to coach Pam Hixon, a win or a tie in this game could mean a possible move upward in the national rankings. A loss will most likely mean no change in the UMass rankings.

"We have nothing to lose and all to gain," Hixon said yesterday. "But right now it is all speculation."

It will not be until Monday morning when Hixon finds out which teams receive byes in the first round of the NCAA tournament. UMass has been in the national championships for five out of the last six years, finishing second in 1981.

These girls know what it is all about," Hixon said. "But as long as we do the job Saturday and then go on to play the tournament with the same enthusiasm we had in the beginning of the season, we have just as good a chance to win as anbody else."

Ah, yes, but what about Saturday? Last season, UMass lost to UConn in regular season play, 2-0. This season, UConn is undefeated, and the Huskies have just one tie, against Dartmouth. UMass defeated Dartmouth earlier this season, 1-0.

None of that really matters now. What is important is UMass come out of Saturday's game with a tie or a win, and show UConn some of what they may be seeing in the NCAA tournament.

"I think this will be a wide open and exciting game," Hixon said.

Hixon said UConn likes to use the fast breaks, but their main source of power lies in their midfield.

"We are going to try to take away their midfield play and force them to pass to people they don't normally pass to.

"We will also try very hard to stick to our own style of play...our own game plan." She added.

Tomorrow marks the last game of a season in which UMass has compiled a 14-2-1 record and remained ranked in the top five in the country.

Tomorrow also marks the beginning of a new season for Hixon and her team.

"The good thing about tournament play is that every team starts out with a clean slate," Hixon said.

"There are always upsets, and any team can go all the way."

Minutemen look to crack up the Engineers

By BILL SHEA
Collegian Staff

The philosopher Irene Peter once had a great revelation. "Just because everything is different," she said, "doesn't mean anything has changed."

I doubt Irene had the 1983 University of Massachusetts football team in mind when she uttered these words of wisdom, but UMass head coach Bob Pickett and his squad would be wise to heed Irene's observation.

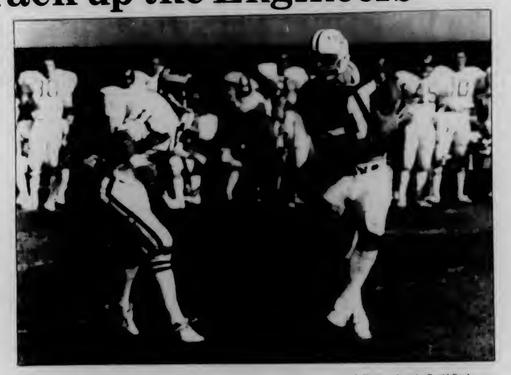
Everything is different for the Minutemen. One week ago they were riding a two game Yankee Conference win streak and in control of there own destiny as far as getting a piece of the Yankee Conference title and the NCAA playoff berth that goes with it.

But last week the Minutemen dropped a 16-6 decision to the University of Connecticut Huskies, eliminating themselves from any shot at a title or a playoff berth.

Hopefully nothing has changed for the Minutemen. Ideally, the fact that the goal of a post-season playoff berth is now an immpossibility, will not deter the Minutemen from the basic goal of the team - to win as many football games as possible.

Tommorow, the Minutemen will be in Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, knocking heads with the Lehigh University Engineers (5-3).

This game will match the potent passing attack of the Engineers against the highly regarded UMass pass defense, which was ranked fifth in the nation in pass defense last week, surrendering only 107 yards a game.



Lehigh has averaged 221 yards per game through the air this year behind quarterback Marty Horn. Horn has connected on 120 of 226 pass attempts for 1,546 yards, 12 touchdowns and 15 interceptions.

The Lehigh ground game averages only 96 yards a game so Peter Tracy, Ken Johnson, Dave Cavanaugh, and the rest of the UMass defensive line can concentrate on getting to Horn.

"This is a typically strong Lehigh Football team," said Pickett, who was an assistant coach at UMass when Lehigh beat the Minutemen 30-23 in a 1977 NCAA Division II playoff game. "They've got the strongest passing game we've seen to date and they've got the running game to compliment the pass."

Quarterback Barrett McGrath (19 for 40,201 yards against UConn), fullback Rich Jenkins and tailback Frank Fay will be in the starting backfield for UMass.

The UMass offensive line will remain intact with the exception of Mike Briggs, who has missed the last two games with a bad ankle. John Benzinger (6'3" 245 lb.) will start at tackle.

UMass teams busy

There will be many UMass teams in action on and off campus this weekend. On campus, the MEN'S and WOMEN'S GYMNASTICS teams will compete in the 14th annual Alumni Meet at 7 p.m. in Boyden Auxiliary gym. The WOMEN'S SWIMMING team also opens up their season by hosting UConn at 2 p.m. at Boyden pool.

Off campus, the VOLLEYBALL team will vie for the MAIAW state crown at M.I.T. The team is seeded second. The MEN'S CROSS-COUNTRY team will be at the New England Championships and the WOMEN'S CROSS COUNTRY team will be at the ECAC championships.

UM booters take third win of year

By MIKE LEVINE
Collegian Correspondent

SPRINGFIELD - Sophomore Tom Uschok's second goal of the season at the 32:57 mark of the first half gave the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team a 1-0 victory over Springfield College Wednesday night under the lights. The win was the second in three games for the Minutemen, and raises their record to 3-9-5.

The winning goal came when fullback Frank Neffinger passed to Herb Sidman, who fed to Uschok, who broke in all alone on Springfield goalie Bernie Watt and then fired the ball past Watt for the game-winner. The goal tied Uschok for the team lead in goals with Kayvan Khatami.

Freshman Jamie Firmage turned in another fine performance in goal, as he stopped five shots to turn in his second straight shutout.

However, the 'close but no cigar' syndrome continues for the Minutemen, as they continue to fail on their scoring opportunities. Uschok, Neffinger, Rich Fortescue, and Fritz Pike all had breakaways during the game that were either stopped by Watt, or were shot wide of the net.

But if Minutemen goalkeeper Donald Donahue is correct, that may very well change soon. According to Donahue, "I can feel it. We're going to break out of this thing soon. I just know it."

If Donahue's prediction is going to come true, the Minutemen had better hurry, since there are just three games left in their season. After the Minutemen travel north to play their final road game at the University of Maine-Portland on Sunday, they will return to the friendly confines of Boyden Field to take on Harvard on Tuesday and nationally ranked Hartwick on November 12th.

Women's tennis ends season at N. Englands

By ARIEL FOWLER
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts women's tennis team met with difficulty as they were eliminated in the main draw of the New Englands tournament last weekend at Harvard.

Out of twelve participating colleges, UMass came in tenth, winning nine of their consolation matches. Harvard came in first place, with Dartmouth and Boston College taking second and third.

"It was a really good experience for us," said UMass coach Pat Stewart. "The scores were not indicative of the team's performance. I feel more weight should have been placed on the consolation matches."

Anne Tauger (2) and Diana Biagiolo (4) each made it to the finals of the singles consolation in three rounds.

"Tauger was really digging and playing well," said Stewart. "She was out on the court for six hours Saturday."

Biagioli sailed bye in the first round of the consolations and went on the defeat Brown and Northeastern before falling to Dartmouth.

Number one singles player Lil Sullivan topped URI but experienced a second round loss to Dartmouth while teammate Anne-Marie Mackertich downed Providence in the first round before being clipped by BC's Nannette Hanson who went on to win the consolations.

In doubles action Maureen Hanlon and Jill Nesgos (1) trounced URI in the first round and endured a 2-6, 3-6 loss to BC while Marie Leary and Laura Morgan cruised bye in the first round and were overcome by URI 6-3, 6-3.

"I have a really good outlook for the spring," said Stewart. "I'm expecting some old players to return which should have a good impact on us and I feel optimistic towards everyone's performance."

LSO attorney to sue UMass administration

By ANNE McCRORY
Collegian Staff

SPRINGFIELD — Claiming constitutional violations in his hiring, a University of Massachusetts Legal Services attorney and his wife will seek almost $250,000 in damages from three administration officials in a U.S. District Court trial scheduled to begin today.

Plaintiffs Michael Pill and his wife, Carol Holzberg, claim defendants Dennis Madson, vice chancellor for Student Affairs, and assistant vice chancellors Larry Benedict and Bryan Harvey "repeatedly interfered with the hiring of Michael Pill" for his position as LSO staff attorney, as well as other positions, "because he had been investigating negligent, incompetent, and corrupt practices in the University of Massachusetts administration since 1976," and because the defendants and other administrators "wished to intimidate Mr. Pill and others employed by the student LSO," against such future litigation, according to the complaint.

The complaint states Pill began working part-time at LSO in 1976 and full time, performing all duties of a permanent employee on Sept. 4, 1979, but was paid as a temporary consultant without medical or other benefits until Nov. 9, 1980, because he was not a member of the Massachusetts Bar Association.

That prerequisite had not been stated in the job description, nor had it been applied to lawyers previously hired for LSO, and was introduced in Madson's office, the last administrative level for appointment approval, "for the sole purpose of presenting the appointment of plaintiff Michael Pill to a professional position in the Student Legal Services Office," the complaint states.

Defending attorney Jeffrey McCormick of Springfield said his clients' response to the complaint constituted a "general denial" of all claims and the case would be argued using "affirmative defenses."

Pill will seek damages for all employee benefits lost when he was classified as temporary employee, including mental suffering, as well as punitive damages against the defendants. Holzberg will seek damages suffered when she became pregnant and gave birth without health insurance as a result of her husband's employee status, as well as all physical and mental suffering resulting therein.

The suit, as prepared by attorney Steven Schlang of Northampton, claims the following legal arguments: "retaliation for exercise of First Ammendment rights," including the right to freedom of speech, press and petition for redress of grievances; "denial of equal protection of the laws" under the Fourteenth Ammendment, regarding the LSO's authority, as decided by the UMass Board of Trustees, to engage in litigation against the University; "interference with advantageous relations," involving the role of the student government Legal Services Governing Board in appointing their own representation; "interference with contractual relations," citing that Pill's professional staff appointment had been approved by LSO and Acting Director of Student Activities O.C. Bobby Daniels before reaching the Office of Student Affairs.

According to a pre-trial memo, the jury trial is expected to last five days and 62 witnesses may be called, including UMass President David C. Knapp, administration officials and members of the Student Government Association.

Sexual preference bill may get another chance

By TRICIA A. YACAVONE
Collegian Staff

The secretary of the Massachusetts Gay Political Caucus said Friday in a speech at the University of Massachusetts that he was optimistic about passage of the bill prohibiting discrimination because of homosexuality, despite the killing of the bill in the State Senate last week.

The Gay Rights bill was effectively killed by the Senate when a vote on it was avoided, and the bill was sent to the Supreme Court to determine its constitutionality.

Secretary David Gearhart said the bill will be approved if it passes through the Senate before it goes out of session on Thanksgiving. If the bill is not returned to the Senate by this time, "It will hopefully be out in February on the Senate floor," he said.

"We have the votes to win, but parliamentary maneuvers defeated it. Next year, we'll attempt to avoid parliamentary pitfalls," Gearhart said.

He said the Caucus and Boston Mayor Kevin White are writing an amendment to the bill to prohibit discrimination of anyone, not just homosexuals, due to their sexual preference.

"The existing bill contains no definition of sexual preference, which would legally allow homosexuals to discriminate heterosexuals. The amendment includes a definition of preference as bisexual, homosexual or heterosexual.

"This (amendment) would make it difficult for the Senate not to pass the bill," Gearhart said.

Gearhart spoke in the Campus Center Friday, as part of Gay Awareness Day at UMass. Other events during the day included lesbian and gay men's health workshops at the University Health Services, "Coming Out" groups, bisexuality workshops and a discussion titled "Straight Talk About Gay People," which allowed heterosexuals the opportunity to express their views on homosexuality.

Ken Paulsen, vice-president of the PGA said the day was successful. "I think the response went very well, especially with the petition."

The PGA asked people to sign a petition which stated that they approved gay rights throughout Friday.

"Over 600 people signed the petition which will be sent to the State House, the chancellor and the SGA Senate to show that there is support for gay civil rights in Massachusetts," Paulsen said.

Rebels drive Arafat, PLO from camp

TRIPOLI, Lebanon (AP) — Yasser Arafat and his PLO fighters, driven from one refugee camp under intense artillery fire, regrouped Sunday to defend their last Middle East stronghold against a tank-led assault by Syrian-backed mutineers.

The harried Palestine Liberation Organization leader, shuttling between Tripoli and loyalist positions, told reporters Syria was trying to destroy him and his 8,000 fighters, and said no truce negotiations were planned.

The rebel tanks and heavy artillery forced Arafat's men to abandon Nahar el-Bared refugee camp outside northern Tripoli and flee to the Baddawi camp just outside the city, Arafat's last redoubt.

Some loyalists moved into Tripoli to escape the advancing rebels, whose four-day onslaught has cost hundreds of lives. Police say more than 500 have been killed and 840 wounded.

The rebels say they want to oust Arafat because he has abandoned the struggle with Israel. Arafat's men say Syria is backing the assault because it wants to control the PLO.

"An average of 25 to 30 shells were falling on civilian heads every minute," said a senior PLO official, attempting to explain the retreat. "We had to do something to ease this massacre."

The official, who requested anonymity, also said the move "strengthened our defense lines around Baddawi."

Lebanese police say many of the dead and wounded are civilians, including Tripoli residents and families living in the camps, which are home to about 45,000 Palestinian refugees.

The two camps are about six miles apart. In the Beddawi camp, rockets fired by Syrian forces supporting the mutineers whistled overhead and exploded near an oil refinery nearby. It has been spewing thick black smoke since a shell set it blaze Thursday.

The rebels have been shelling the camps persistently. Artillery and rocket barrages from Syrian positions hills have provided cover for the mutineers, advancing behind 30 Syrian T54 and T-62 tanks.

Christian and Moslem religious leaders in Tripoli issued a joint appeal Sunday for a cease-fire to end "this dreadful catastrophe."

The International Red Cross on Sunday repeated its plea for medical supplies, including blood and pain killers.

Arafat's control over the PLO began to falter seriously 13 months ago, when Israeli invaders forced him to evacuate Beirut and disperse into Syrian occupied Lebanon and other Arab nations.

In May, Syrian-backed guerrillas openly split from Arafat's organization, Syria declared him unwelcome in June and then helped the mutineers expel Arafat loyalists from eastern Lebanon, their last direct confrontation line with Israel. The loyalists retreated north.

Chrysler workers end five-day strike

(AP) — Striking autoworkers at a Chrysler Corp. stamping plant in Twinsburg Sunday approved a local contract that puts them — and about 20,000 other workers nationwide — back to work.

The proposed settlement, reached Saturday after a five-day walkout, was approved 801-293, United Auto Workers local President Bob Weissman said. The Twinsburg plant will reopen with the midnight shift Sunday night, he said.

The 3,200 Twinsburg workers struck Tuesday, alleging forced overtime, poor working conditions and safety and health issues.

Under the agreement, plant workers will have every third weekend off. The plant, which produces all front doors and most of the steel underbodies for Chrysler cars, has been operating seven days a week to meet demands for parts. The company also agreed to provide more janitors at the plant.

Union officials explained the new pact to workers Sunday afternoon before voting at the Cathedral of Tomorrow in Cuyahoga Falls.

Saturday's agreement had come after a bargaining session stretching 34 hours, said Warren Davis, a regional UAW director.

In Detroit, Chrysler issued a statement saying, "We are gratified to have an agreement and look forward to ratification so we can get back to building cars."

Chrysler said it will reopen car and truck assembly plants Monday in Windsor, Ontario; Warren, Mich.; and the St. Louis area.

Another Windsor truck plant and a Detroit car operation will reopen Wednesday; a Newark, Del., plant will reopen Thursday, and a Belvidere, Ill. plant will reopen Nov. 14, the company said.

Union president dead

PITTSBURGH (AP) — United Steelworkers President Lloyd McBride, who recently had heart bypass surgery, died Sunday in his sleep at his home, a union spokesman said.

McBride, 67, who lived in suburban Whitehall, died at 7 a.m., spokesman Russell Gibbons said. The cause of death was not immediately known.

McBride had been discharged Nov. 1 from West Penn Hospital in Pittsburgh, where he had a sextuple heart bypass Oct. 18.

US to rebuild hospital

ST. GEORGE'S, Grenada (AP) — U.S. Army choppers dropped hundreds of leaflets over northern and central Grenada on Sunday urging residents to cooperate in locating any Grenadian army or Cuban resisters to the U.S.-led invasion.

Officials, meanwhile, said U.S. aid will help rebuild the mental hospital that the American military says it bombarded accidentally.

American efforts to clear out all holdouts have continued since shortly after the Oct. 25 invasion, when U.S. military jeeps with loudspeakers circulated to rural villages blaring messages urging resisters to surrender and telling them they would not be harmed.

Rembrandts recovered

NEW YORK (AP) — The FBI believes it has found five stolen Rembrandt etchings worth $500,000 in a coin locker at the Grand Central Station terminal in Manhattan.

The FBI said two of the art works, "Presentation in the Temple in the Ark Manner" and "Clement De Jonghe, Printseller," are believed to have been stolen from the National Gallery of Canada in Ottawa on Oct. 14. A spokesman said two gallery officials would arrive Monday or Tuesday to certify that the etchings are the work of Rembrandt, the 17th century Dutch master.

The other three works — "Faust," "van der Linden," and "Manasseh" — are believed to have been stolen from the Byrd Library at Syracuse University on Aug. 10.

Supreme Court debates legislative reform bill

BOSTON (AP) — The state Supreme Court will hear arguments Wednesday on a disputed legislative reform petition that Attorney General Francis Bellotti rejected.

If the court overrules Bellotti, the rules referendum would become a prime election issue in 1984.

The referendum, backed by the Coalition for Legislative Reform, would curb the powers of the House speaker and Senate president over appointments and the flow of legislation. It also would drastically reduce bonus pay for leadership positions.

Bellotti refused to approve the petition on the grounds that it attempts to write legislative procedure rules into law.

Soviet Union develops mind control weapons

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Soviet Union has achieved "significant progress" toward developing mind-control weapons, says a U.S. Army study disclosed in a new book on military uses of psychic phenomena.

Author Martin Ebon contends that mind-altering effects or "remote monitoring of brain wave activity" are among possible reasons behind the Soviet microwave bombardment of the U.S. Embassy in Moscow.

"Soviet scientists view the brain as an apparatus available for probing and manipulation," Ebon says. "They are well aware that perfected techniques in ESP and other phenomena would make effective wartime strategies."

Publication of Ebon's book "Psychic Warfare: Threat or Illusion?" comes amid increased interest in parapsychology research on Capitol Hill as well as within the Pentagon and U.S. intelligence agencies.

A report prepared recently by the Congressional Research Service, an arm of the Library of Congress, concluded that "psi phenomena" could be applied in education, medicine, geological exploration and business management.

European leaders meet

OTTAWA (AP) — Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau flies to Europe Monday for talks with the leaders of six NATO allies and Pope John Paul II in a peace initiative to improve relations between the United States and the Soviet Union.

Trudeau will discuss his ideas for encouraging dialogue between the superpowers, with West German Chancellor Helmut Kohl, French President Francois Mitterrand, British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher and the leaders of Italy, Belgium, and the Netherlands.

"Just as war is too important to leave to the generals, so the relationship between the superpowers may have become too charged with animosity for East-West relations to be entrusted to them alone," Trudeau said when he announced his initiative in a speech in Guelph, Ontario, last month.

Prisoner misses dog

NEW YORK (AP) — Convicted murderer Jean Harris says in prison she misses her dog more than she misses Dr. Herman Tarnower, the lover she killed, according to an interview published Sunday.

Mrs. Harris, serving 15 years to life at a prison in Bedford Hills, N.Y., for the murder of the Scarsdale Diet author, told WPIX-TV she wishes her dog could be with her.

"I think if I had a dog in here, I really wouldn't miss anything," she said. A portion of the interview was published in the New York Daily News.

Mrs. Harris has written a book on what to expect in jail.

"You have to know what it's like to live like an animal in a cage to appreciate what it's like to get out of that cage," she said.

UMass students lobby for more aid

By PAUL BASKEN
Collegian Staff

WASHINGTON — Acknowledging that Massachusetts congressmen have supported higher education financial aid programs in the past, a student lobbying group for the University of Massachusetts yesterday arrived here to reaffirm that support.

Students Advocating Financial Aid (SAFA) has scheduled meetings today and tomorrow with senators and congressmen to enlist their help in maintaining student aid which President Ronald Reagan has proposed be cut from next year's budget.

SAFA President James Quinn said the three-day trip has two primary goals; pushing the congressional delegation harder to recommit its leadership in a critical year of budget re-authorization, and thanking them for their past efforts, since "without that support, many students wouldn't be going to school right now."

The Reagan administration has recommended a total federal financial aid budget of $1.5 billion less than this year's appropriation, according to the National Association of Student Financial Aid Administrators. Quinn said this includes a recommendation of no new money for the Supplemental Educational Opportunity Grant, the State Supplemental Incentive Grant, and the National Direct Student Loan programs.

Making this recommendation more threatening, Quinn said, is that a bill to set the federal financial aid guidelines for the next three to five years is scheduled for debate this year. The 38 SAFA representatives are planning to meet Tuesday with Rep. Paul Simon, D-Illinois, chairman of the Subcommittee on Post-Secondary Education of the House Committee on Education and Labor.

Students met last night with Maryln McAdams, a staff member on Simon's subcommittee, who defended seeking, against the advice of colleagues and educators, a new reauthorization bill, with two years remaining on the present one.

McAdams said she is seeking the reauthorization bill now because the 1984 presidential campaign has made education "a very major topic right now, and emphasis on education will probably end the day after election."

The second purpose of reauthorization, she said, is to immediately combat this summer's Supreme Court repeal of the "legislative veto," which reserved the right of Congress to rescind any regulation issued by the Department of Education, or any other executive agency. As a result of this ruling, Congress wil be forced to write more specific language into bills to minimize freedom of interpretation by the executive branch.

Having been briefed in Amherst and here on lobbying procedures, small groups will form and begin visiting individual congressmen and their aides today. The organization is led on this trip by former congressional staff member Gerald Grady of the UMass political science department.

Committee seeks scheduling efficiency

By JILL LANG
Collegian Staff

A newly-created University of Massachusetts administrative committee has started working to improve the efficiency of the scheduling of classes and exams.

The Advisory Committee for Scheduling, established by Acting Vice Chancellor for Academic Affairs and Provost Samuel F. Conti, held its first meeting Friday.

In a memo dated October 28, Conti said he was creating this committee "to ensure that the Scheduling Office meets the needs of both the academic and student areas."

Fern Johnson, acting associate provost for undergraduate education and chair of the committee, said her group hopes to achieve "the maximum use of time and space on the University campus."

Policies for the scheduling of exams and classes will be reviewed and changed if necessary, Johnson said.

"But it is too soon to talk about major revisions because we need to see all the data. We have to be sensitive to the concerns from student affairs as well as those from academic affairs," Johnson said, noting the importance of "input from all the trenches."

Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Dennis Madson said this committee "will make some real difference" in the efficiency of the scheduling office.

As a faculty member, Johnson said she was concerned about issues addressed by the scheduling office and now she is excited about the plans the committee is making.

"The scheduling office is one thing that intimately involves the students," Johnson said. "We have a lot of work ahead of us, but it is very important that we relate academic affairs and student affairs."

Eventually, Johnson said, the committee hopes to update the scheduling programs used by the central computer, become more automated, and time more efficiently the scheduling of classes and exams so as to have them ready for the semester's preregistration period.

The committee will meet again in two weeks, and begin to add details to the outline created at Friday's meeting.

Candidate Hollings' wife campaigns at UMass

By PAUL BASKEN
Collegian Staff

The wife of presidential candidate and U.S. Sen. Ernest F. Hollings, D-S.C., Friday proposed $14 billion worth of grants for students next year which could be paid for by eliminating $70 billion earmarked for the MX missile and B1 bomber.

"Surely the school children of America are worth one weapons system," Peatsy Hollings, former "first lady" of South Carolina, told a press conference Friday. "$14 billion for education leaves plenty for deficit liquidation."

Mrs. Hollings held the press conference after discussing her husband's campaign with about 15 members of the University community at a noon luncheon in the Campus Center. Her visit followed stops here in each of the two previous semesters by Democratic Sen. Gary Hart of Colorado.

While Hollings has been running behind former Vice President Walter Mondale and U.S. Sen. John Glenn of Ohio in recent Democratic straw polls, his wife expects him to attract increased support after the holiday season, when she feels attention will be paid to issues rather than polls.

"The best defense you can have is an educated citizenry," she said in advocating her husband's proposed federal bonus of $5,000 annually for elementary and secondary school teachers. She explained his plan would establish local commissions which set down guidelines for a teacher receiving the federal bonus, which would be doubled for inner city instructors.

PEATSY HOLLINGS campaigns for husband

Refusing to label the proposal "merit pay," she expected it would apply to college teachers holding a college degree in their subject area, rather than basing it on a subjective judgment of ability. Neither Hollings nor his plan has the endorsement of any national education group, including the National Educators Association, which is backing former Vice-President Mondale.

In detailing her husband's position on higher education, she said he does not support the president's sacrificing of federal grant programs for more student loans, and gave the senator credit for adding $1 billion to Reagan's fiscal year 1984 higher education budget.

Although he "has not been a vice president and he has not been an astronaut," Mrs Hollings said her husband is the only candidate to have served both in his state legislature and on Capitol Hill. "None of them have really had that grass roots experience," she said of the party's seven other candidates.

"The Democrats are going to have to have a moderate at the head of the ticket," she added as further reasoning for his optimism about the race.

Rejecting the traditional hypothesis that a dark horse such as Hollings is in the race only to settle for the vice presidency, she said she "would be enormously surprised if he chose that over being ninth in seniority in the senate.

"I don't think that he'd give that up."

Hampshire College conference says men have rights , too

By DAVID SUMMERSBY
Collegian Staff

Just as the women's movement in the 1970s grew from the local level into regional and national support networks to change the situation of women, the men's movement today is expanding throughout the country to affect change for men.

The National Organization for Men (NOM) was established two years ago and this past weekend at the Northeast Regional Men's Conference at Hampshire College, gains were made towards the formation of a Northeast regional men's organization.

Also resulting from the three-day conference, entitled "Making Connections", were plans for a men's support network in the Pioneer Valley.

About 30 men and women pledged donations totalling $320 for this group to get off the ground.

Another meeting is planned for Dec. 10 at the University of Massachusetts.

NOM Spokesman Bob Brannon said the men's movement involves young, old, straight and gay men for purposes of personal growth, escaping from typical male stereotypes and fighting sexism.

The conference at Hampshire brought together about 230 men and women, not only to organize, but to socialize and to educate each other through workshops and discussions.

"This was an opportunity to let men realize they are not alone anymore in needing to relate and share feelings of gentleness and loving for other men as well as in rejecting the stereotype roles of sexism," David Emery of Maine said.

The workshops allowed the participants a chance to hear new ideas and talk to each other about issues pertaining to men's rights.

One workshop dealt with the problems men experience with abortion and resulted in the consensus of the group that support groups are needed for men involved with abortions.

"We get so focused on the women having the abortion we don't take care of ourselves. It is a very lonely experience," said one man.

SGA seeks input for constitution revisions

In an effort to gain campus-wide input on revisions in the Student Government Association constitution, a series of open meetings will be held beginning today by the Governmental Affairs Committee of the Undergraduate Student Senate.

Committee member John Flynn said students are urged to come to today's meeting at 3:30 p.m. in Campus Center room 177 and "state any objections they have with the new document," or suggest that the SGA "stick with what we have now."

The SGA is rewriting its constitution so it can be approved by the University of Massachusetts Board of Trustees for the first time in almost 30 years. UMass Chancellor Joseph Duffey has threatened to cut off all SGA operational funds if a revised constitution is not turned in to him by approximately the end of November.

Amherst divided on coed

By KAREN MEYERS
Collegian Correspondent

Eight years after Amherst College became a coeducational school, women there have mixed reactions about how far the college has come in its acceptance of female students.

While some women said they have been accepted in the school and have established themselves in leadership positions in campus organizations, others said there is still a trace of subtle sexist attitudes on the part of some faculty members and male students.

Elizabeth Kloster, a first year student from Norway, said, "There is less harassment here than at schools which aren't traditionally male."

Kloster said "Some men have trouble dealing with women of the same or higher intellectual levels," but that "all in all we do get respect from the majority of the men here."

Positive feelings are not diminished in older students. Suzanne Weber, a junior from New York City said she felt that "most men (at Amherst College) are sensitive and have a lot of respect for women".

Anne Marie McGowan, a junior and an editor on the campus paper, the Amherst Student, said "we have a lot of women in high positions, both on the newspaper and in student government."

McGowan said that the majority of prejudice was subtle and came from "a few of the older professors and some alumni."

She also said some men had trouble dealing with women of the same or higher intellectual levels and that although it's "not a majority mentality, some men wouldn't marry a woman with career goals. They want a wife who'll stay home with the kids," she said.

Other negative feelings about the Amherst College men and their treatment of women came from non-Amherst College women.

Seana Chun, a sophomore from Smith College said "men definitely have power here" and "they have a definite macho attitude."

The number of women at Amherst College is slowly increasing according to one administration.

"We now have roughly 39-40 percent women" said Robert Grose of the Office of Institutional Research.

"Over the last three years we've had a sex-blind admission procedure," said Grose.

A sex-blind procedure means the sex of the applicant is not used as a basis for acceptance to the college.

Grose said that the number of women is now increasing at a slower rate because "it is now only proportional to the number of women applying to college."

EDITORIAL/OPINION

What in the world are we doing?

According to a survey conducted last July only eight percent of Americans have an idea of what's going on in Latin America right now (i.e. for example at least what side the US government is on in El Salvador). Steven Barrett, whom I had the misfortune to read in last Thursday's Collegian, certainly is a member of the majority in this respect.

Several issues and facts seem to by either conveniently forgotten, ignored or downright suppressed when it comes to looking at the foreign policy in this country. Firstly, it is an ill-publicized fact that the Grenadian invasion has been on the U.S. drawing-boards ever since the 1979 revolution in that country. This was shown by the Ocean 1 and Ocean 2-marine maneuvers that staged a quasi-invasion trial on a small island near Puerto Rico, that in many respects paralellled that of last Tuesday. Four days of negotiations were undertaken with Cuba before the U.S. invaded. So much for a surprise rescue of Americans in danger, eh?

Blake Poland

Secondly, the airstrip that the administration has been making so much noise about was begun with U.S. funding prior to 1979, to enable 747's to bring more tourists to the balmy little island. Thirdly, many political experts agree that the Grenada incident may well be a testing of waters for a U.S. invasion of Nicaragua, by testing public opinion domestically and abroad (in response, that is, to a reinvigoration of an interventionist foreign policy. Along the lines of what Tucker proposed in his 1980 thesis-influential in military circles-as a "surgical strike", that is strong, fast and with quick withdrawal...effective in its success and in minimizing critical public opinion). Fourthly, we seem to have forgotten that grass roots revolutions (be they socialist or not) are by definition effected for and by the masses in response to their burning concerns, feelings, and needs. This was as true of the October Revolution of 1919 in Russia, the Sandinista overthrow of Somoya in Nicaragua, and the Bishop takeover in Grenada as it was of the American Revolution. This is irrespective of whether Communism has ended up evolving into a system that really serves the people now or not.

One could hardly have called the Bishop regime in Grenada a "Marxist dictatorship...built and maintained upon the fear of death and imprisonment" when it was brought to fruition by the people, characterized as it was by social reforms to redress the problems of poverty so common to many "underdeveloped" countries today. The Sandinistas, for their part, have always been concerned with improving the lot of the common peasant people. These cannot afford to feed their starving children, to lead an even vaguelly healthy life, or enjoy a millifraction of the many necessities and luxuries we so take for granted here in North America. Unfortunately, U.S. backed aggression from Honduras and surroundings has forced Nicaragua to divert to military uses precious resources that would otherwise have gone to the people. In such countries there is no such thing as military slush funds or the like, food must be taken from the mouths of the needy to engage in military games in which they have no interest (except self-preservation). So why do we support a foreign policy that bolsters neo-Nazi regimes such as that of El Salvador, raping and massacring a populace whose only interest is to find food for the day and avoid torture and death? One could hardly call this upholding democracy.

I say "we" because clearly our silence is being taken by the Reagan administration as our tacit approval for policies which the international community is finding increasingly despicable, and which has won the U.S. nothing but enemies in South, Central and Latin America, as well as the rest of the world. To a considerable extent U.S. foreign policy could, in this respect, said to be quite counterproductive. We might be making enemies who then "side with the Commies" (to put it in terms understandable to the Barretts, 'Wineburgers' and Reagans of the world). Is it in the name of "national security" that the world's strongest nation invades the smallest in its hemisphere-with a total population of that of Springfield, Mass.? Do we define justice by force or by democracy which the government here purports to uphold?

Nor is this the first such occasion. This country has a history of supporting characteristically *un*democratic governments/dictatorships. To name a few: Shah of Iran (clearly not popular with the people, even if we find their motives hard to understand-there is no such thing as suppressing a people for their own good) "governments" in the Dominican Republic (since 1965), Nicaragua (formerly), Chile, El Salvador...the list goes on.

I urge that we examine the facts-all the facts-in this issue. A call pro-Reaganists often make in response to "Marxist emotionalism" but rarely uphold in practice. I also urge that we make not only our feelings but the facts known to more (North) Americans, who at times seem remarkably backward in this respect, for a nation so "advanced".

Columbus day-What it is

Dani Burgess

Recently, we had a holiday, which most of us including me, probably really needed and appreciated. Do you remember what that holiday was? It was Columbus Day.

Most of our historical perceptions of Columbus are of some great Spaniard who "discovered" America. We learned of his three ships, the Santa Maria, the Nina and the Pinta. We learned of his heroic adventures to "the new world." What we didn't learn was WHAT HE DID THERE! I'd like to share with you some enlightening information I learned in a Social Science course here at UMass and more directly from the book, "A People's History of the United States" by Howard Zinn.

Columbus was on a voyage specifically after gold and slaves. On October 12, 1492, Columbus and his crew members landed on an island in the Bahamas. They were greeted by the inhabitants, the Arawak Indians, (who "discovered" America long before Columbus was born.) Columbus wrote about these Indians in his log, "They...brought us parrots...and many other things, which they exchanged...They willingly traded everything they owned...they do not bear arms...With fifty men we could subjugate them all and make them do whatever we want." He also wrote, "As soon as I arrived in the Indies, on the first island which I found, I took some of the natives by force..."

Columbus was looking very hard for gold to bring back to Spain and thus justify his voyage to the King and Queen. In return, Columbus would receive ten percent of the profits, governorship over new found lands and the title, "Admiral of the Ocean Sea." This insane desire for gold created a man who would stop at nothing, including genocide in order to achieve his goal.

Back in Spain, Columbus reported that, "Hispaniola is a miracle...there are many wide rivers of which the majority contain gold." He also said that the Indians "are so naive and so free with their possessions...when you ask for something they have, they never say no." (He neglected to mention that he got in a fight with two Indians about a trade, and speared them with his sword and let them bleed to death.)

Columbus' second voyage included seventeen ships and over twelve-hundred men. Their purpose — slaves and gold. Returning to Haiti, (Hispaniola), Columbus found his men had been killed in a battle. Columbus formed another base in Haiti and from there he sent out expeditions to find gold. They found no "fields of gold" so in order to return something to his investors in Spain, he launched a massive slave expedition in 1495. They caught fifteen-hundred of the Arawak people and of these they picked the strongest five hundred and sent them to Spain, (two hundred of these slaves died en route to Spain.) Columbus later wrote, "Let us in the name of Holy Trinity go on sending all the slaves that can be sold."

Columbus, still eager for gold, ordered all Indians age fourteen and over to collect a specified amount of gold every three months. In exchange for the gold the Indians were given copper beads. Indians found without a copper token had their hands cut off and bled to death. The Arawaks were no match for the musket and sword bearing Spaniards. The Indians fled to the mountains and were hunted down and murdered. Mass Indian suicide and infanticide was spreading among the Indians out of exasperation. In TWO years Columbus and his men were responsible for the death of half, (OVER 125,000) of the Arawak Indians. In 1515 roughly 50,000 Indians were left, in 1550, 500. In 1650, the report of the year shows none of the original Arawaks or their descendants left. GENOCIDE!!

Samuel Eliot Morison, a Harvard historian, wrote in his popular biography, Christopher Columbus, Mariner (1954) "The cruel Policy initiated by Columbus and pursued by his successors resulted in complete genocide."

I hardly need elaborate to any great extent of the atrocities of how this genocide took place, other than to say that the Spaniards used women for their sexual gratification, i.e. rape. They "thought nothing of knifing Indians by the tens and twenties and cutting off slices off them to test the sharpness of their blades." Or "Two of these so-called Christians met two Indian boys one day, each carrying a parrot; they took the parrots and for fun beheaded the boys." Columbus day, A Celebration of Genocide.

I don't know what all this means to us today, hopefully, as slightly more humanistic people. What significance does it carry that we celebrate a man who was so awfully brutal.

Dani Burgess is a UMass Student.

Letters
Let's hear it for Steve

To the Editor,

Bravo Mr. Barrett, bravo! Your recent column defending American intervention in Grenada affected me much like a big glass of ice water would a man dying of thirst in the Sahara!

How politically like the Sahara this campus is one may easily determine by reading the Editorial/Opinion page of this paper on any given day. If still in doubt one need only note the numerous leftist, almost weekly, rallies, the expenditures by the SGA for liberal politics, and the bewildering number of left-minded groups on campus to be thoroughly convinced. Reams and reams of the same dusty, liberal stuff must be consumed, column after column, till one reaches your writing, Mr. Barrett, which provides instantaneous relief.

Some may find it hard to believe, but there are those who agree with your politics. Not all of the UMass student body believes that President Reagan is a swaggering warlord dedicated to the eradication of humanity, or believe the Communists are misunderstood idealists.

I, among many others less vocal than the liberals, appreciate your articulate and insightful advocacy of the conservative position. This paper should also be commended for giving Mr. Barrett the opportunity to give the "other" side, too often ignored at this university.

WOMEN'S FORUM

Women's Forum

Women's Forum is a weekly listing of upcoming events relating to women's issues. Notices should be sent to the Women's Issues Editors, care of the Collegian, 113 Campus Center, before the Friday preceding the event.

There are two hotlines available on campus for aid to victims of rape or other violence. The 24-Hour Rape Hotline is 545-2677. The Everywoman's Center Hotline for victims of violence is 545-0800.

Monday —The Anti-Racism Team will meet at 4 p.m. in room 901, Campus Center.

Tuesday — The Women's Issues Team will meet at 4 p.m. in room 901, Campus Center.

Wednesday — A six-week support group for survivors of rape begins at the Everywoman's Center. The group will focus on some common issues facing survivors of rape, such as fear, anger, making plans, family and friend's reaction and trying to recapture intimacy in relationships.

For more information and to register for the group, contact the Everywoman's Center, 545-0883.

The Sojourners will hold an informal discussion for women of all ages to explore issues of faith, love, intimacy, and spirituality from 7:15 to 9:15 p.m. in room 428 in the Student Union.

The Committee for Equal Rights and Reproductive Freedom will meet at 4 p.m. in room 901, Campus Center.

Thursday — A resume writing workshop will be held at 12 noon in Campus Center room 805-809. The workshop is sponsored by the Working Women's Task Force of the Everywoman's Center.

Saundra Oyewole will speak on From Zoology to Microbiology and Back at noon in Cole Science Center room 114, Hampshire College. The lecture is part of the Women and Science Lecture Series.

'UMass Answers' inquiries

By LISA BORDERS
Collegian Correspondent

A toll-free number at the University of Massachusetts offers referrals on a wide range of subjects--from agriculture to writing resources--to callers throughout the state.

UMass Answers, which contains information on over 3,500 topics in its data banks, is geared primarily towards aiding Massachusetts business, industry, and government, according to Jack Cavacco, operator of the program.

"The referral is set up to help anyone who has a question they think someone at the University might be able to answer," Cavacco said.

To get a caller in touch with the right person, Cavacco refers to a computer printout with subject listings. He is then able to give the caller the name, address, and telephone number of the contact person.

"About 98 percent of the referrals are to University contacts," Cavacco said.

Although UMass Answers is not intended for students with general questions, Cavacco said it has helped students to gather information for research papers.

The Continuing Education Department started the program in February of 1982 in response to complaints that other areas on campus did not cater to referral questions. Costs are low, since the only real expense involved is the telephone, Cavacco said.

The system requires periodic computer updates to ensure its accuracy; aside from this, it is virtually maintenance free.

"We are in the process of updating and refining our subject headings to make the system even more accurate," he added.

An average of three calls a day are handled by UMass Answers, a number which does not surprise Cavacco.

"People are not using it frivolously," he said. "They know about it and use it when they have a legitimate question."

The toll-free number is 1-800-282-7708, and it is available Monday through Friday from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m.

Conquer flawed but fun

SHE STOOPS TO CONQUER
Nov. 1, 4, 7, 9, 11
Curtain Theater, FAC

By LORENA NOZZOLILLO
Collegian Correspondent

What has 13 cast members, runs around in circles, screams, yells, guffaws, gesticulates, and has an all around good time? The answer is the MFA Showcase's production of Oliver Goldsmith's She Stoops to Conquer. Director Lisa Kornetsky conducts this play at such a fast clip, you have to pay close attention to follow all the action.

The play's sub-title is "The Mistakes of the Night" and with good reason. The whole play is filled with misinterpretations, trickery, and mischievous deceit.

The plot centers around an eligible young maid named Kate Hardcastle. Her overindulging father informs her he has found a wonderful suitor. This particular young man is the son of his good friend, Sir Charles Marlow.

The young man has a reputation for being scholarly, handsome, brave, but excruciatingly timid and shy. At their first meeting he cannot even look Kate in the eye. Kate tries to conquer her problem by "stooping" in her stature. In other words, Kate pretends to be a simple barmaid, so that her suitor will feel free to be himself in her presence.

Meanwhile, Kate's devilish step-brother, Tony Lumpkin, has convinced young Marlow that the Hardcastle residence is a local Inn, and that Mr. Hardcastle, his future father-in-law, is the inn-keeper. Mr. Hardcastle is taken aback by this brash young man, who is supposedly so meek, and instantly takes a disliking to him.

While all this is going on, Constance Neville, (Kate's cousin) is plotting to escape from the clutches of her overbearing aunt, Mrs. Harcastle (Kate's stepmother, mother of Tony Lumpkin) to escape with her lover Mr. Hastings (a close personal friend of Mr. Marlow). Are you following alright? Don't worry if you feel as confused as the characters do, everything turns out right for all concerned.

Young Mr. Marlow soon realizes that Mr. Hardcastle is far from being an innkeeper, and Kate is far from being a barmaid. After this Mr. Hardcastle forgives him for his rudeness, and Kate gladly agrees to be his bride. Also, Mr. Hastings and Constance decide against eloping, and return home.

With everyone pulling tricks on one another, pretending to be someone else, or thought to be someone else, it's easy to become as confused as the play's characters. However confused you may be, you'll no doubt appreciate the whimsical script and the comedic antics of the cast.

Even though they spend most of the time running around the Curtain Theatre stage at breakneck speed, the cast slows down enough to deliver some genuinely funny performances. The most enjoyable actors to watch were Elaine J. DeConinck (Mrs. Hardcastle) and Richard F. O'Neill as Tony Lumpkin. DeConinck was outrageous as the nagging, domineering mother, and O'Neil played the spoiled-rotten son with a good amount of spunk and zest.

David Mendes and Elaine DeConinck clown around in a scene from the MFA Showcase's production of She Stoops to Conquer.

Becket Royce played the extravagant Kate with a type of elegance and composure. However, Cheryl Lamoreaux, who played the cousin Constance, seemed to have a lot more energy and exuberance in her performance. Christopher Benoit, as Mr. Marlow and David Mendes, as Hastings, both made stylish gentlemen suitors. Benoit also effectively falls apart on cue whenever Miss Royce is in his presence.

This should be a rollicking, madcap comedy that never lets up. Even though this play is genuinely funny, it needs to have just a little more life brought into it, to make it work perfectly. Nonetheless, it's a show certainly worth the money.

The performances were fine and funny, the costumes — well-tailored, and the script — truly comical. However, despite all this, something was missing. Despite the fact that the cast gave its' all, and that the play moved at such a quick pace, this production isn't quite as lively as it should be.

"She Stoops to Conquer" will be performed at 8 p.m. November 7, 9, and 11 at the Curtain Theatre, FAC.

Rita makes the mark

Educating Rita
Directed by Lewis Gilbert
Hampshire 4 Theatres

By JEAN BUCHHOLDER
Collegian Staff

Educating Rita opens with a high-angle shot of a slim, poorly made-up female figure hobbling through the refinement of England's college system. She is distinguishably a working class woman, in a hot pink mini skirt with hair colored to match, and high heels that keep getting stuck in the cobblestone cracks.

This is Rita. She is a wife, and a hairdresser, and she is dissatisfied with her life. She comes to the University, to Dr. Frank Bryant's door, hoping to fill the emptiness inside of her with something other than the baby that her family persistantly urges her to have. It is with determined enthusiasm that Rita sets out to discover a more fulfilling life.

Metamorphosis begins to set in, but one wonders if the cacoon is turning into a butterfly or if the butterfly is backing into a cacoon. Rita goes through a series of superficial changes — dress, hair and diction are all adjusted to match the norms of the college pseudo-sophisticate. It is these dreaded, anticipated alterations that bring out a long supressed cynicism in Frank; a scoffing at the emptiness of theoretical study, and a disdain for the cold heart that the "intellect" turns to passionate living.

Situated in what he considers to be a clinical job, Frank sees himself as a tainted educator headed toward emotional sterility. Futilely the doctor drinks to mourn his deafening ear. His daily stumbling about the classroom in drunken stupor becomes a floundering cry for release from academia's cursory clutches. He has become a dying poet lecturing on the uselessness of dead poets.

It is Rita's vitality that he seeks. And it is Rita's vitality that he wishes to preserve in disuading her from higher education. What Dr. Bryant fails to realize is that his soured criticism of academia is an opinion validated by experience. If Rita were to drop out, as is his obvious but hidden desire, she would be turning a cold heart to passionate living. She must intellectually "arrive" in order to determine where she stands. It is at this point that she will be able to "choose" the direction in which she wishes to move. And it is at this point that we are confident that she will make the best choice.

Michael Cain is a disillusioned English prof and Julie Walters, his working-class pupil in Educating Rita.

Educating Rita will assault the confused student's common sense in initially making one want to drop out of school, and then in reaffirming some of the reasons why we are here. While the theme, an offshoot of the everpopular rags-to-riches story, is not a new one (and there are lines of spell-breaking cliche to match), Michael Caine as Frank, and first timer to the screen, Julie Walters (who originated the part on the London stage) make the storyline fresh, emotional, and endearing. Viewers will leave the theater with the warm sensation of having been entertained.

Don't be led into thinking that this is "the band" of the future, or the "second coming of the Clash," definitely not. "The Stand" is a great song and the EP is a promising debut. Whether or not they are for real though, is, as of now, uncertain.

Rebels with a cause

The Alarm
The Alarm (I.R.S.)

By JIM FEIN
Collegian Staff

With the current onslaught of new bands over the past three years, one would expect a wide variety of music and themes to have emerged. This, to a large extent, has occurred. However, when asked to name a conventional rock and roll band, both socially aware and truly rebellious in spirit, I am hard pressed. Not since the beginning of punk rock, when the Clash and the Jam were in their prime, has there been a band who has been able to meet these criteria.

Now, along comes a band called the Alarm. A Welsh quartet, the Alarm first appeared a few months back, opening a few concerts for U2 quite successfully. The Alarm are Mike Peeters (acoustic guitar, harmonica, and lead vocals), Dave Sharp (acoustic guitar), Eddie Macdonald (bass), and Twist (drums). It is most interesting to note that this band employs no electric guitars, preferring acoustics instead, because, according to the band, "the songs were written on acoustics." Don't be misled into thinking that the band plays soft and slow though. One listen to their first and only record, a self-entitled, five-song EP, will dispel any notion of that.

The opening song, "The Stand," starts the album off in fine fashion. This is, by far, the best song on the album, and one of my favorites of the year. Effective harmonica, acoustic guitars, and drums provide a good melody for the song's subject matter, personal politics. Some of the lyrics:

When I looked out the window, on the hardship that struck,
I saw the seven files opened, that claimed him innocent.
For a man to the grave in silence, headstone endowed with grace
A simple word across it had no epitaph engraved.
Come on down and meet your maker
Come on down and make the stand.

"Across the Border," an accurate description of the situation in Northern Ireland, condemns violence while supporting neither British nor Irish viewpoints. Strained lead vocals by Mike Peeters immediately bring to mind an angry Joe Strummer, back in the early days of the Clash.

The rest of the EP is of varying quality though. The subject matter basically concerns a rebel attitude, inspired by a dissatisfaction with one's lot in life, and the social climate that therein exists. "Marching On" is a catchy song, but the other songs ("Lie of the Land" and "For Freedom") are musically muddled with terrible harmonica and melodies that are mediocre at best.

An energetic Blues Bash

JOHN HAMMOND
JOHN LEE HOOKER
WILLIE DIXON
THE ROBERT CRAY BAND
Friday, Nov. 4
Rusty Nail

By SHEILA CLINTON
Collegian Correspondent

One generally sees the same faces when a good blues artist is in town; blues fans are a dedicated and appreciative lot, but on Friday night at the Rusty Nail, four different groups brought the blues to a crowd of over 400. The show was billed as a "blues blast" and fans were treated to not one, but four, talented blues singers and their bands. The energy and enthusiasm generated that evening seemed at an all time high.

The Robert Cray band opened the show at 9 p.m. Their sound is a popular and highly danceable blues. John Hammond followed, playing, alone and for a little while, giving the evening a more mellow feel. The audience seemed to enjoy both of these artists but they were there to see Willie Dixon and John Lee Hooker. And when Willie came on stage it felt as if the night was just beginning.

Willie captivated the crowd for over an hour. He has written most of the great blues songs that have been recorded by musicians from Howlin' Wolf to Cream. Willie spent a while talking with me after his set, telling me about the shape of blues and his own background. In 1937 he won the Golden Gloves Heavyweight Championship and at the same time was playing the blues. When asked why he pursued music, he laughed and replied, "The bass fiddle don't fight back when you hit it. As long as there are conflicts and misunderstandings blues will be around to explain it. As times change the blues change. I play a newer type of blues, John (Lee Hooker) plays an older type. The average youngster today is questioning where everything came from, including music, and that is why blues will always be popular. All American music is derived from the blues, but nowadays we call it something else to keep it from being the blues, we commercialize it."

Willie's set covered a variety of forms, from the ever popular "Wang Dang Doodle" to "Mannish Boy" and "All Night Long." He sang a beautiful song called, "It Don't Make Sense if You Can't Make Peace" that pointed out in our high technology age we can send a man to the moon and give sight to the blind, but "it don't make sense if you can't make peace." Willie's music is a vehicle for his message of the need for peace within each of us. Willie didn't just sing about peace and the blues Friday night, he explained it to the crowd and in talking to him I could see he lived by it.

And finally, the "King of Boogie", John Lee Hooker came on. A member of his band dedicated the evening to "Everyone who has been burnt, busted, laid off, evicted or heart broken in the last 90 days. Did I get everyone?" The crowd went wild. 'Til after 2 a.m., the audience danced to John Lee Hooker's soulful, Chicago blues. When the lights finally came on there were 400 smiling and energized people milling around. This was the first "Blues Blast" that the Nail has had; I know many who would like to see this become a tradition.

Brown to face UMass in NCAA soccer

Brown University will be the opponent for the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team in Sunday's NCAA quarter final match at 1 p.m. at Boyden Field.

Brown defeated Keene State 1-0, last Friday in Providence in the preliminaries. UMass defeated Brown once before this season 3-1.

The third seeded Minutewomen, who have never lost to the Bruins at home, got goals from Ellen Taggart, Stacey Flionis and Lori Stukes in the Sept. 29, win.

UMass wins in women's swimming opener

By JOHN BADGER
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts women's swim team opened their season Saturday with an 80-60 victory over the University of Vermont. Co-captain Elizabeth Feinberg led the way, winning four events.

UMass started out strong in the 200 medley relay with Feinberg coming from behind on the last leg to give the home team the lead that they never relinquished. The junior went on to take firsts in the 200 freestyle, the 100 freestyle, and the 200 individual medley.

Caroline Freitas added to the UMass lead by taking second in the 1000 yard freestyle and first in the 200 back stroke. Freshman Alison Uzzo took firsts in the 1000 yard freestyle and then sealed UMass' win with a victory in the 500 freestyle.

Jeanne Bushee dominated the diving competition, taking second place off the one meter board and first place off the three meter board. Her combined 243.7 point total set a new UMass record for women's diving.

"We have a tough schedule but I'm looking forward to a winning season," said head coach Valerie Turtle, "This team's worked so hard the past few weeks, I feel we're swimming now like most teams do in the middle of the season. We've picked up where we left off last year instead of having to start over like most teams. We won 11 out of 16 events thanks to the efforts of swimmers like Liz Feinberg and Caroline Freitas. I'm really pleased with freshman Alison Uzzo as well. She's a strong swimmer and a great competitor."

UMass travels to valley rival Smith next Saturday at 1:00 for their next dual meet.

Patriots win fifth over Bills

FOXBORO, Mass. (AP) — Steve Grogan launched two scoring bombs to Clarence Weathers and set up another touchdown with a 35-yard completion to Stanley Morgan as the New England Patriots rolled to a 21-7 National Football League victory over the Buffalo Bills Sunday.

The Patriots, 5-5, had won in Buffalo two weeks ago, 31-0, and led 21-0 Sunday until Joe Ferguson threw a 1-yard touchdown pass to Mark Brammer with 4:01 left in the game. The Bills dropped to 6-4.

After a scoreless first quarter, New England capitalized on one of its four interceptions against Ferguson to take a 7-0 lead.

Spikers second in MAIAW

By GERRY deSIMAS
Collegian Staff

CAMBRIDGE — As the overused cliche from the baseball world goes, 'It ain't over till it's over.' The Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT) learned this lesson and used it to their advantage as they topped the University of Massachusetts volleyball team for the MAIAW state championship Saturday.

UMass broke out of the starting gate against MIT in the "so-called championship game" and took an early 5-0 lead against a team that had over 30 wins and was undefeated.

It really wasn't designed to be the championship game, because it was a round-robin tournament and the team with the best record won the title.

UMass and MIT came into the match with 4-0 records and so the tourney organizers were plugging the match as the state championship finals. And MIT had some estimated 400 loyal fans in the gym that were quickly shut up when the Minutewomen blasted out of the box with their quick lead.

"We came out sparkling in the first game," UMass assistant coach Sara Bonthius said. "We were playing defense out of our socks."

However, MIT came back for five quick unanswered points to tie the game up and that took the wind out of UMass' sails. And MIT rolled to 15-6 and an astonishing 15-1 win over UMass for the title.

"It was all downhill from there," said Bonthius. "We lost heart. Our service reception struggled and our passing was off. We came out timid in the second game. "MIT was a very strong team. They didn't make errors and they read our offense very well. They were very smart."

Massachusetts was not without their stars. Captain Joanne Siler played exceptionally well, both offensively and defensively. Everyone on the team played, too, giving UMass more depth than they've had in quite a while.

And they used that depth to go through the tourney undefeated before the MIT game.

UMass (32-15) opened with Lowell and struggled but overcame with a 15-9, 11-15, 15-13 victory. Wellesley fell next in a 15-6, 15-13 UMass win and Eastern Nazerne fell to UM 15-11, 15-4.

Of Patti Shea, Hixon said, "Patti was her usual, poised self."

Although the game ended in a tie, statistically, UMass outshot and outcornered UConn, 15-7 and 14-11 respectively.

"We tied the top team in the country," Hixon said."To me, that means we are just as good as they are. I'll take the tie."

Looking ahead to the NCAA tournament, Hixon said her team "knows the score," and she called the UConn game "a confidence builder for the tournament."

Snakebitten UMass falls to Lehigh

RATS! — UMass and head coach Bob Pickett came that close to winning but Lehigh prevailed 21-20.

By BILL WALL
Collegian Staff

BETHLEHEM, Penn. — The University of Massachusetts Minutemen dominated all aspects of Saturday's football game against Lehigh University but a dramatic, last-minute touchdown drive engineered by Lehigh rendered it all for naught as UMass came up short losing 21-20.

With UMass leading 20-13, Lehigh marched 80 yards in sixteen plays as the Engineers converted on three fourth down situations to sustain the winning drive, also kept alive by a super catch by Eric Hunsberger in which he outwrestled cornerback Glenn Holden for the ball.

Lehigh (6-3) quarterback Marty Horn (20 of 41 for 212 yards and 3 int.) hit sophomore Rennie Benn for a 17 yard TD pass with 20 seconds left in the game to pull within one. Benn caught the two point conversion and UMass was finished. A last ditch flea flicker by flanker Kevin Jackson was picked off.

The UMass offense was able to generate more than 430 yards in total offense and had possession of the football nearly twice as long as the Engineers, but threw it all away as quarterback Barrett McGrath was intercepted five times, two of which led directly to Lehigh touchdowns. To his credit two of the interceptions resulted from tipped passes.

"We beat ourselves...the mistakes will kill you. We had gone nine quarters without a turnover," said Minutemen head coach Bob Pickett.

UMass had complete control of the game in the first half as the offense posted 257 yards while the defense held Lehigh to just 75 yards. The defense registered eight tackles in the backfield and nabbed two of Horn's passes to contain the Lehigh offense. But McGrath (15 of 33, 198 yards, five interceptions) and company, although able to march up and down the field, committed three turnovers within the Lehigh 35 yard line during the half.

Massachusetts (3-6) led at the half 10-0 on a 31 yard field goal by George Papoutsidis and a nine yard scoring pass from McGrath to Bob Simeone.

The second half started off much as the first half did with UMass giving the ball up on interceptions their first three possessions. But the results were different as Lehigh was able to convert two of free safety Jimmy Gum's three interceptions on the day into touchdown passes from Horn to his high school friend split end Benn. This enabled Lehigh to surge to a 13-10 advantage within the span of four minutes.

Given the swiftness of the Lehigh comeback, it could have been expected for UMass to be demoralized and lose all of its momentum. But such was not the case as the offensive unit came roaring back with a 69 yard touchdown drive led by a stellar performance by the offensive line. Overcoming a holding penalty and sparked by a 27 yard jaunt by tailback Frank Fay McGrath put UMass up 17-10 with an option run up the middle for 12 yards through a wide hole provided by the offensive line.

The onside kick by the Minutemen failed and after a Lehigh punt, placekicker George Papoutsidis nailed the longest field goal of his career, a 43 yarder to put UMass up 20-13.

Offensively, Fay Jackson, George Barnwell, Rich Jenkins, Bob Simeone and especially Jim Rice (who had his best game rushing as a Minuteman, highlighted by a 33 yard third-quarter dash) all played exceptionally well with the offensive line able to take heart in their effort also.

Defensively, linemen Peter Tracy and Ken Johnson had two sacks each and Craig Lesinski had an interception and 11 tackles. It was a game the Minutemen could have won but the seven turnovers and the final gutsy Lehigh drive has UMass looking at its first back-to-back losing seasons in more than 20 years. The Minutemen travel to New Hampshire to face the Wildcats next Saturday.

Hustling UM ties top ranked UConn

By JILL LANG
Collegian Staff

Winning isn't everything, and in Saturday's University of Massachusetts/Connecticut field hockey matchup, winning wasn't the only thing, either.

Before the game, Hixon had emphasized her team's objectives when playing UConn. A win or a tie would most likely raise UMass in the national rankings, and a loss would cause no change in her team's standing.

The fifth-ranked Minutewomen fought to a 1-1 double overtime tie with the Huskies, ranked first in the nation in what UMass coach Pam Hixon called "a total team effort."

"I can't really say anyone played any worse or any better than anyone else," Hixon said after Saturday's game. "Everyone did their jobs just as they were assigned to be done."

This match was important not only because UMass and UConn are rivals, but also because of the effect the game would have on the rankings especially for UMass, and in turn, on the first and second rounds of the NCAA tournament.

The first four teams in the nation receive byes in the first round of the tournament, and Hixon will know by noon today whether UMass moved up. Old Dominion (2), Iowa (3) and UNH (4) are ahead of UMass.

"If we do stay fifth," Hixon said, "then we would probably have to meet UConn before the Final Four, and that is not what we want."

Hixon called Saturday's match a "moral victory" and a "spectacular match." Both goals were scored in the last twenty minutes of regulation play.

UMass scored first, at 21:32. On the second of two corners, middie Megan Donnelly took the pass from forward Sue Packard, and nailed the ball into the back of the net.

All through the first half, and for the most of the second, UMass spent a lot of time in the UConn end of the field, but had trouble penetrating.

This did not get the Minutewomen down. The largest home crowd of the season, coach Hixon, and the players themselves kept UMass in the game.

More than once forward Patti Smith could be heard encouraging her teammates, and shouting "Let's go UMass!"

The UMass defense held tough through most of the game. Over and over preventing UConn from scoring, most especially on corners.

UConn tied the game at 10:56 in the second half, when on a corner play, UConn forward Cindy Dysenchuk took a pass from teammate Laurie Decker, and put the ball past UMass goalie Patti Shea.

Two ten minute overtime periods followed regulation game, but neither team could find the net.

"Each goal was earned," Hixon said, "the goalies kept their (respective) teams in the game.

"We did what we had to do. It's hard to hold a team like UConn to no goals."

It was heated hockey action

By GERRY deSIMAS
Collegian Staff

The game started in 40 degree weather and drizzle. And even though many spectators had cold feet, the action on the field was hot and continuous between the UMass and UConn field hockey teams, Saturday.

The matchup between the top ranked team in the country, UConn, and fifth ranked UMass was a familiar one. It was like a game played on the same NOPE field in 1981 when a scappy Connecticut team, ranked fourth in the country at the time, came up and tied the unbeaten and top ranked Minutewomen. UConn went on to beat UMass for the NCAA title that year.

And as in 1981, it was full of emotion. This year both teams were fired up from the start, but you could say UMass was fired up just a little bit more in the role of the underdog.

You could tell UMass was riding high when Patti Smith led a cheer off the field as the first half ended.

UMass put the pressure on UConn in the second half with the 1-0 lead off the Megan Donnelly-Sue Packard corner play that also came close quite a few times.

"Those are a set play," said Donnelly, an All-American as a freshman last year. "That one meant a lot. They're a real tough team."

UConn did tie it up about 15 minutes later on a good goal, but the Minutewomen continued to dominate the game. They outshot and had more corners than the Huskies.

"We made some changes and it got us out of our staleness," said Hixon. Among the changes: Pam Moryl from forward to midfield, Carol Progulske and Donnelly from defense to midfield, Lil Hultin from midfield to defense and Chris Coughlin back to sweeper. And everyone made a big play sometime.

As Hixon said at the end of the game, "We did it together."

Black Homecoming Week 1983

by Segun Eubanks
Nummo Staff

Black Homecoming Week has been a tradition in our community at UMass for quite a few years. Black Homecoming is a time for the community to come together and celebrate the new school year. But even more than that, Black Homecoming represents the culture, politics and personality of our community. It grew out of a need for the Black community to express itself and make its presence known. A need that was totally ignored and even supressed during the traditional UMass Homecoming.

Every year Black Homecoming has a theme that represents the significance of the coming year. Black Homcoming 1983 was celebrated last week with a very special theme: the celebration of the life of John Coleman Wright Jr.

The week began with a memorial for John Wright in which friends and family came togther not to mourn his death but to celebrate his life. Close friends Michael O'neal, Renee Payne and Elizabeth Skelton spoke about John, his life and the examples he set for the community. The singing, the laughing, the crying and the praying of the people gathered together gave the event a very special aura and meaning that brought everyone closer together. The evening gave Black Homecoming Week a new and special perspective.

Mrs. Carol Wright, John's mother, and Greg Wright, John's younger brother, celebrated with the community. "You have shown me a side of John that I never really knew," said Mrs. Wright. "It makes me very happy to know that others love John as I love John." Mrs. Wright was given a bouquet of roses and a lot of warmth and love as the evening came to a close.

Black Homecoming Week continued with Dick Gregory speaking at Bowker Auditorium (see related story). His political perspective and keen insight gave the audience a type of education that is very rarely found in a classroom. The audience was mesmorized as Gregory's theories, strongly supported by facts and statistics, came to the conclusion: "You can make the difference, but you better get moving because recess is almost over."

The culture of the Black community came alive with the film, "From These Roots" on Wednesday and the Gospel music and celebration that rocked the halls of the Student Union on Friday.

The week ended on Saturday with the "Master Rocker Jam" and the crowning of the First Annual Black Homecoming King and Queen. Congratulations go to Antonio Gomes, '85 and Jan Gumes, '87, our first King and Queen.

The success of Black Homecoming Week is attributed to the Afrikan-American Students' Society (Afrik-Am) that sponsored and organized the events. Special thanks go to all those who worked hard to make Black Homecoming possible and to those who attended the events and participated in the activities.

The only dissappointing aspect of the week is that so few people were involved in the work of putting it all together. Black Homecoming is a community activity that everyone should be involved in. The future of other Black Homecomings and community activities depends on participation of more students. All too often too few do the work that many should be doing. Let's all get involved in bringing our community together and making next yeart's Black Homecoming as strong and beautiful as this one has been.

Dick Gregory: Comedy with a Message

by Russell Jordan
Nummo Correspondent

The often controversial, always irreverent, Dick Gregory enthralled an audience at Bowker Auditorium last Monday night. Gregory had the crowd rolling with laughter one minute and in thoughtful contemplation the next with his scattergun brand of comedy and social criticism.

His topics ranged from racial attitudes in this country to the policies of the Reagan Adminisatration, and even his unique views on drug use and dietary habits. Often called exterme, Dick Gregory is a deeply committed man who combines a jaundiced cynicism with hope and love for his fellow human beings. His comments were often bitingly satirical but always laced with the belief that people have the power to change things.

"You can make a difference," was the comment he repeated throughout his speech. Gregory was often on target with his statements; he struck sensitive nerves with his chastisement of people's lack of commitment and his pointing to their social and political apathy. He appealed to Blacks and other Third World peoples to register to vote. He supported Reverend Jesse Jackson's bid for the Democratic nomination for Presidency while, at the same time, questioning the value of either the Republican or Democratic Party.

For over three hours Gregory spoke and assailed the Soviet Union and the United States for creating much

Panel Discussion on South Africa

by Russell Jordan
Nummo Correspondent

A panel discussion on South Africa was held Wednesday night in the Amherst College Converse Hall Red Room. The speakers were Michael Thelwell, author and UMass Afro-American Studies professor; Babu Abdulrahman, an Amherst College visiting professor from Tanzania; and Ibrahim Gora, United Nations Representative from the Pan-African Congress.

Thelwell spoke first, calling South Africa "a traditional colonial state circa 1920." He continued by saying, "South Africa is a ruthless, racist regime which is supported tacitly and directly by the United States and American business heavily invested in the country." He accused South Africa of "possessing nuclear weapons to intimidate bordering African states." He said the entire region of South Africa is "as volatile as the Middle East." He concluded by saying "Four million white South Africans cannot continue to oppress the 26 million non-white South Africans and, at the same time, defy the rest of Africa."

Babu said that South Africa "has direct implications for the surrounding, so-called frontline states of Mozambique, Angola, Zambia, Botswana, Tanzania and Zimbabwe." He spoke against South African military strikes into Mozambique and Angola, and he sharply criticized the system of Apartheid that concentrates an unequal share of the wealth and land of the country into hands of the European descendants. This system effectively discriminates against the native Africans, Asians and so-called Coloreds (people of mixed racial background) by enforcing strict laws that separate people along the lines of race. "South Africa is the last bastion of colonialism," said Babu. He claimed that South Africa's heavy arms build-up and suspected acquisition of nuclear weapons was brought about in part by the independence movements that freed most of the rest of Africa from colonial rule. This defense build-up is also in response to the 1979 Zimbabwean revolution that overthrew the racist regime of Rhodesia.

Babu said that because of the economic disenfranchisement of Africans, Asians and people of mixed color in South Africa, the government must look to the frontline border countries for expansion of their markets. Because of this, these frontline countries are in danger of South African military and economic manipulation. As an example he said, "South Africa wants to destabilize Zimbabwe in order to make it less attractive to U.S. companies wishing to invest there and thus prevent economic competition."

He compared Black South Africans with Black Americans, showing the similarities between the once prevalent U.S. segregation laws and the South African system of Apartheid. "Most of Africa is ignorant of this kind of racist oppression. Black Americans and (Black) South Africans have been through the mill." He concluded by saying, "The world will not have peace until South Africa is free."

Ibrahim Gora spoke last, citing the history of armed struggle that the native Africans waged against the European, primarily Dutch, colonists from as early as 1652 to the present. He accused the leadership of South Africa of being Nazi sympathizers, saying that "many of the people in power in South Africa today openly supported Hitler, and many of South Africa's leaders were interned by the British during WWII for being Nazi sympathizers." He spoke of the inequities and absurdities that the system of Apartheid imposes on all South Africans. "Education for whites is free and compulsory, for non-whites it is neither free nor compulsory. South Africa is a very violent society," he continued, "with the highest prison population in the world." He quoted grim statistics on malnutrition and infant mortality. "527 our of every 10,000 Black chidlren die before the age of 5. The rate for white children is only 27 out of every 10,000." He called the 80's the "most significant decade for South Africa," and stressed throughout his talk, the importance and inevitability of armed struggle on the road to liberation.

The panel discussion was sponsored by the African Studens Association and concluded with a question and answer period with the audience.

Mayor Dick Hatcher to Visit UMass

On Thursday, November 10 Richard Gordon Hatcher will speak at UMass on "The Significance of Jesse Jackson's Presidential Candidacy to Democratic Politics in America."

Hatcher, the fourth-term mayor of Gary, Indiana, is nationally heralded as a leading Civil Rights activist. He is committed to the interests of Black Americans as well as to international affairs. His declining an offer to join the Carter White House Staff in order to fulfill his term in Gary; his chairing the African and Caribbean affairs lobby, TransAfrica; and his diplomatic travels to Kenya and to the People's Republic of China all reflect his domestic and global concerns.

The 50-year-old Hatcher has practiced law, has taught college and has served on and chaired Democratic, Black, urban and various other committees. He has published articles on cultural liberation, on media's effects on the Black community and on urban Black politics.

Hatcher's Thursday lecture will address Jackson's recently confirmed candidacy and its political impact, given Jackson's own words at his official candidacy announcement, "We are necessary, we must assert ourselves, our time has come."

All are encouraged to hear Mayor Dick Hatcher on Thursday at 2 p.m. in CC 1009.

Sponsored by UMass Chancellor Joseph Duffey and Five College Black Studies, Inc.

of the turmoil in the world and for the increasing arms build-up. He called for greater concern for the handicapped and said, "The mightiest nation will not be the nation with the strongest army or air force, but the nation with the healthiest people mentally and physically."

Gregory, a vegetarian and frequent faster, encouraged people to live and eat naturally. He encouraged people to abstain from a wide ranging list of substances such as tobacco, drugs, alcohol and meat. He suggested that people would do well to take proper care of their bodies because, "your physical health can affect your mental health and vice-versa." He encouraged people to exercise and drink plenty of water. Gregory, married and the father of ten children, also spoke against capital punishment and abortion.

Though one may not agree with all his views, Dick Gregory is a man of compassion, deep faith and committment. He moved the audience to think through their laughter, and he was as much educating as he was entertaining. He is certainly one of the most biting and sharp social commentators of our day, and a concumate comedian as well. Gregory, at the end of his talk, thanked UMasss and the audience for inviting him. The audience could respond only with a standing ovation.

Vincent Chin and American Justice

by Aiko Pandorf
Nummo Correspondent

The facts surrounding Vincent Chin's death illustrate the growing wave of anti-Asian sentiments in the United States. In August 1983, more than one year after Vincent Chin, a 27 year-old Chinese-american draftsman, was viciously beaten to death by two white men in Detroit, the Department of Justice finally agreed to the possibility of the violation of Chin's civil rights and initiated a formal Grand Jury investigation.

In June 19, 1982 Vincent Chin and three friends (one Chinese-American and two Caucasians) went to a bar to celebrate Chin's upcoming wedding. In the bar Ronald Ebens confronted and verbally assaulted Chin. Ebens, thinking Chin was Japanese, accused him of ruining Detroit's auto industry: "It's because of you mother f---ers that we're out of work."

Later that night Ebens and his stepson Michael Nitz consciously and deliberately stalked Chin and his friend Jimmy Choi. In a McDonald's parking lot, Ebens and Nitz clubbed Chin to death with a baseball bat. Ebens and Nitz were arrested at the scene while Chin murmured his last words: "It isn't fair."

On October 5, 1982 Judge Thomas C. Bayles presided at the preliminary examination of Ebens and Nitz. Bayles was critical of the charge of second degree murder brought against Ebens and Nitz and remarked on record: "There was first degree murder. They have breen undercharged."

Bayles, as the preliminary judge, was nevertheless forced to bind the defendants over to the Wayne County Circuit Court on a charge of second degree murder. On February 8, 1983 negotiations on a plea bargain resulted in pleas by both the defendants to the lower charge of manslaughter.

On March 16, 1983 Michigan Wayne County Circuit Court Judge Charles Kauffman pronounced sentence on Ebens and Nitz. Prior to the judge's decision, however, no attorney from the Wayne County Prosecuting Attorney's Office was present to argue on behalf of the deceased victim, Vincent Chin.

After hearing arguments from the defense attorneys only, Kauffman released both Ebens and Nitz on three years probation and a fine of $3000. Kauffman rationalized his sentencing with these remarks:

> We're talking here about a man (Ebens) who's held down a responsible job with the same company for 17 or 18 years and his son (Nitz) who is employed and is a part-time student...
> These men are not going to go out and harm somebody else. I just didn't think that putting them in prison would do any good for them or for society...You don't make the punishment fit the crime; you make the punishment fit the criminal.

In response to the negligent handling of the prosecution by the Wayne County Prosecuting Attorney's Office and the gross insensitivity and miscarriage of justice by Judge Kauffman, the Chinese-American and Asian-American communities of Detroit organized the American Citizens for Justice(ACJ). The ACJ has demanded that the court consider Ebens' and Nitz' racist intent in committing Chin's murder, and has been greatly responsible for the appeal of Kauffman's ruling.

Given the facts of Chin's case, the Asian-American community charges that racism shadows the ideals of justice and civil rights. The next step in Chin's case may indicate where matters lie.

All quotes are attributed to the American Citizens for Justice Report on Vincent Chin.

Editor's note: Due largely to the ACJ's efforts and to the Asian community's demands, a Federal grand jury reinvestigated Chin's case. On Thursday the court found Ebens and Nitz guilty of violating Chin's civil rights. They now face life imprisonment sentences if convicted.

Rufus and Chaka Khan Live-- Stompin' at the Savoy

by Richard Thorpe
Nummo Correspondent

Rufus and Chaka Khan: they are musical legends in our own time. A great band which has continually produced hits throughout the 70's and 80's has, to this writer's and many other fans' dismay, decided to go their separate ways. Even though this statement is now fact, the tell-tale signs of an imminent break-up were festering since before the Masterjam LP, which contained the smash hit, "Do You Love What You Feel," was released in 1980. Rufus and Chaka Khan decided to try the solo route for a while.

Khan's success without Rufus began with the 1978 release of I'm Every Woman and continued for three successive albums. Rufus sputtered during this time and could only find limited prosperity. Rufus did enjoy being an integral part of Michael Jackson's Off the Wall, which was among some of the best selling albums of all time. Khan, on the other hand, could be heard on Quincy Jones' Stuff Like That.

Khan was also involved in an exciting experimental label, Elektra-Musician, which primarily spotlighted several prominent and new jazz artists. She was the featured vocalist on that label's Griffith Park series; Joe Henderson, Stanley Clarke, Chick Corea and Lenny White, the latter three-fourths formallly of the stellar jazz-fusion band, Return to Forever, and the former an internationally renowned jazz sax man, backed her up. Finally after this hiatus, Rufus and Khan remerged and made a stunning comeback early in the summer of 1983 with the unheralded smash, "Ain't Nobody."

This record reached the number one position on Billboard Magazine's Black singles chart and, on the dance/disco top 80 achieved a rank of number eight after just ten weeks on. Its popularity is undiminished in the face of time also. People still demand to hear this record even though November creeps up. Musical prosperity is often measured in sales and profitability, but longevity also has a prominwent role.

The album which spawned this musical goldmine is entitled, quite accurately, Rufus and Chaka Khan Live-Stompin' at the Savoy. Rufus is comprised of Chaka Khan-vocals, Tony Maiden-vocals and guitar, Kevin Murphy-keyboards, Hawk Wolinsky-keyboards, John Robinson-drums, and Bobby Watson-bass. The Savoy, a New York City club which has featured great talent through the years, ironically closed soon after this last Rufus and Khan concert appearancce.

Live at the Savoy, produced by Warner Brothers, is a seventeen-song package including the best and most popular compositions ever by them. Sides one, two and three were recorded live at the Savoy and side four has four brand new studio-produced cuts. Only three songs, "Hollywood," "Everlasting Love," and "Best of Your Heart" were omitted from the concert. The unbelieveable thing is that Rufus and Khan, together as a unit, seem to have the uncanny ability to continue on stage what they do in the studio. Every live song, from "You Got the Love" to the roof-tearing finale of "Do You Love What You Feel" has the emotional intensity of a live performance plus the consistency and excellence for which they are known.

The guest musicians on the record are among the industry's best: Jerry Hey, Ernie Watts, Larry Williams, David Williams and Lenny Castro. Hey, Watts and Williams, along with Gary Herbig, comprise the horn seciton, and what a horn section! Then there's Joe Sample (piano), Paulinho da Costa (one of the most requested percussionists around) and Greg Phillinganes (synthesizer bass). The musicianship is unsurpassed. Every song on the LP is a joy to behold and although I would love to describe, in depth, each and every one, space won't allow, so I'll just relay five of my favorites to you.

"Stop on By" features a biting guitar solo from Tony Maiden and a sassy tenor sax solo from side man Ernie Watts. It's got an infectious hook and features strong backing vocals by Stephanie Spruill, Lee Maiden and Julia Tillman. "Stay" is a more melodic and laid back song. Once again Ernie Watts solos and aptly handles the chore. "Do You Love What you Feel" is everyone's favorite, and judging from the enthusiastic reaction the audience gave, it was definitely well worth being the finale. It has all the power and emotion of the original studio version. "Try a Little Understanding" features Bobby Watson's punchy bass line and a rhythmic keyboard arrangement. Ernie Watts' solo and a break add even more spice to an already vibrant and powerful song.

My only criticism comes with the final song, "Don't Go to Strangers." This classic jazz piece, arranged by Ralph Burns, features Joe Sample on piano and Khan on vocals. The music is fine, but towards the end she struggles to hit notes without screaming. Her powerful voice is Khan's trademark, but on this classic she exhibits too little restraint.

Chaka Khan and Rufus may never appear together again, but they have left us fanatical fans and music connoisseurs a legacy. It may have been said that a good thing has got to end, but wine gets better with age; to sacrifice musical fermentation for soloistic pursuits is something many people will be disappointed with. I suggest, in light of reminiscing, to obtain a copy of this album (by any means necessary-honestly, of course!) and ponder what the future brings as the past rekindles the fire.

Look for Chaka Khan at the Fine Arts Center on Saturday, November 19!

Special Exhibit at Augusta Savage Art Gallery

by Brenda Ling
Nummo Staff

A special art exhibit of African tribal masks is on display this week at the Augusta Savage Art Gallery in New Africa House. Students of Dorrance Hill's class, Sculpture: Clay and Plaster, have worked for six weeks making these replicas.

Hill describes the students' projects: they begin with a Xerox copy of the mask, but "alter it slightly and, in the process, learn about the African tribe that made the mask and learn about the people." Students keep the basic shape and form of these ceremonial masks and add their individual touches, which is the success of the exercise, says Hill. "I could look at each of these masks and tell you who made them."

Nevertheless, the creativity involved in making the masks begins not with the students' individual coloring or sculpturing. Hill says, "Every society has masks. When you put on a mask you can alter your personality, you can become another person."

The Clay and Plaster class will hold a critique session during the next week to see the finished products hung up under proper lighting. "Students need to see their work in the right atmosphere, especially after spending so much time on it."

The exhibit runs only through Friday, so be sure to stop by soon.

James De Jongh Speaks on Oral History and Do Lord Remember Me

by Brenda Ling
Nummo Staff

On Saturday in Southwest Hampden Theater, playwright James De Jongh spoke on "Oral History and the Development of Do Lord Remember Me." De Jongh currently teaches at the City College of New York University. In a loose discussion setting, he spoke to the intimate crowd of twenty-five about his personal approach to the play.

De Jongh began by saying that "When I look at Black literature, two elements come to the fore: the historical focus, historical events and attitudes; and the oral tradition, the folkloric tradition." He noted that the latter tradition had been underestimated and ignored until the Black Awakening of the 1920's.

With the development of this oral focus in his mind, De Jongh said, "I wanted to do something with a very different world, a different angle," e.g. not about street gangs like his previous novel. He turned to the writings of the 1930's Negro Studies Project to read the first-hand narratives of ex-slaves.

When reading the interviews De Jongh found that they "had a theatricality in and of themselves." He knew that he could use those peoples' real words without "hav(ing) to conform to the needs of publishers." He felt that his task was to make the Blacks' experiences speak for themselves.

De Jongh told the enthusiastic audience that he was always conscious of thematic clusters, of recurrent points, of "linkages of progressions from one set to another." At times this was difficult to achieve, given that "most of the interviews tend to be fragments, pieces of a puzzle."

Later, when writing the play, De Jongh confronted the problem of combining the accounts of "hundreds of different people-how do you produce a piece with a unified theatrical movement?" He remarked that the play originally had seven cast members and that he narrowed it down to the present five who speak, really, as "a single voice."

De Jongh mentioned that the Project's interviews took place in the 1930's and involved Blacks who had lived through emancipation at a young age. Missing were testimonies of elder slaves who had tried to escape. Segments of the play that focused on Nat Turner, the Black slave rebellion leader, then "became a central focus of the piece," to compensate for the lack of oral records of attempted runaways.

Most trying for De Jongh was his own proposition, "How do you write a piece about slavery that is not totally depressing and horrible?" He responded that "the challenge became sequencing, finding that throughline (to) give the play a forward motion, a sense of poise, a sense of balance."

Helping him most in this endeavor was his clearly focused goal from the outset. A long statement of Henrietta King moved him most strongly; in Do Lord the woman sits in a rocking chair to tell the story of how her mistress cut the long, deep scar on her face. De Jongh said solemnly, "she lived with that disfigurement for 86 years. When I found out that, I knew it was going to be the end of the play. I only had to get to it," to construct a backdrop to set that scene.

And that final point De Jongh called "the wisdom of the oral tradition," a complex attitude, a mannered poise. "She still holds onto that anger (against her mistress), keeping a lot of opposing forces in tension, but in a kind of eloquent stillness.

"I didn't create that attitude. I discovered it in the, people; it's a learning experience to get something like that from people thought to be illiterate or uneducated." In the end, though, De Jongh himself is responsible for coordinating the scenes, for highlighting peoples' experiecnes and for integrating, in his words, the Nietzschean "lyric form and poetic recitation" with the African storyteller whose tale, bit by bit, becomes "less an imaginary person" and more and more "begins to come to life."

SAO women speak out on 'pigeons'

By MICHELLE HYDE
Collegian Staff

Women workers in the Student Activities Office of the University of Massachusetts Monday voiced concern over a group of male Building Operations workers who sit in the hallway of the Student Union Building and allegedly leer and whistle at women who walk by.

"Everyone's felt the eyes upon them" as they walk past the men, said Sue Jean of the Student Activities Office. "They've been doing that for years--it kind of goes along with the buildings."

"We call them the pigeons," said Judy Gagnon, another office employee. "They just sit there and watch you as you walk by. It really irritates us," she said.

Barbara Riordan of the office said, "There are always three of four men who sit there and smoke and drink coffee and watch you as you walk up to them and then after you walk away."

Judy Gagnon said, "I've heard them whistle at women before. Some of them I know by name will say sexist things like, 'you look sexy today."

UMass defines sexual harassment as "any unwanted or inappropriate sexual attention...that can make a person uncomfortable on the job or in the academic or living environment and includes looks, leering, innuendoes, verbal abuse, and remarks about a person's clothing."

Riordan said, "We have to walk down that long corridor (next to the barber shop) as they watch us walk pass. It makes the females on the staff very uncomfortable. I've even heard some men complain."

The women said they thought the men should congregate in the Hatch or in a "break room" instead of sitting by the window in the hallway.

The men do have a private break room, according to Forrest Davies, the director of Building Operations. But "we decided not to force it on them. It would be infringing on their human rights by dictating where they should spend their breaks," he said.

"But I know what you mean," about the problem, he said.

"If we got enough complaints we could do something about it. If enough people felt strongly about it they could circulate a petition and then we'd have to do something," Davies said.

Senate Chamber bombed

By KEN BAZINET
and PAUL BASKEN
Collegian Staff
and the Associated Press

WASHINGTON - A bomb exploded Monday night near the Senate chamber inside the U.S. Capitol Building, police reported.

There were no reports of injuries in the blast, which one witness described as "a big heavy clap of thunder" about 11 p.m.

A group calling itself the Armed Resistance Unit claimed responsibility for the explosion and said it was in reaction to the U.S. invasion of Grenada and the presence of U.S. Marines in Lebanon.

Capitol Hill police officers Monday night secured the perimeter of the Capitol building. Several police vehicles circled the Capitol Hill area and no one was allowed within approximately a quarter mile of the building. FBI agents were on the scene and had entered in unmarked cars.

Uniformed officers made no comment at press time but did tell Collegian reporters there was no loud explosion.

Several fire trucks and three ambulances were on the scene.

"It went off in the vicinity of my office," said Senate Minority Leader Robert Byrd, D-W.Va., who was not in the building at the time. The bomb went off just outside the ceremonial Mansfield Room some 30 feet from the Senate chamber, said Rep. Austin Murphy, D-Penn.

Murphy said the explosion appeared to have been caused by two to five sticks of dynamite and that the blast left that area of the Capitol filled with smoke. Austin said, however, that there was no fire. He said the doors to the room were blown off and there was wall damage where the explosion occurred.

The Washington Post received a telephone call at 10:55 p.m. from a group calling itself the Armed Resistance Unit, which apparently claimed responsibility for the bomb blast.

A recorded voice said: "listen carefully because I'm only going to say this once," according to news aide Roger Saucier.

The voice did not refer to the blast but said "the action" was in support of all nations' struggle against U.S. military action and was in reaction to the U.S.-led invasion of Grenada and the presence of Marines in Lebanon, Saucier said.

Police dogs were combing the scene for possible clues in the explosion, said the minority leader.

Laurie Santos, a passerby, said she was three blocks from the Capitol when she heard an explosion that sounded like "a big heavy clap of thunder" about 11 p.m. EST.

She said that seconds later, she saw smoke coming from the Senate side of the Capitol building.

"After the explosion, I saw people running towards the Capitol, but no one was running away from it," Ms. Santos said. "I didn't see any damage."

LSO attorney testifies in trial

By ANNE McCRORY
Collegian Staff

SPRINGFIELD - Plaintiff Michael Pill yesterday testified University of Massachusetts administrators caused him to suffer financial and mental hardships when they denied him a professional appointment in the Legal Services Office after the search committee had approved his application.

Pill said he "felt angry and humiliated" when he was refused professional status as staff attorney for 15 months by Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Dennis Madson and Assistant Chancellor Larry Benedict, whom he said would not approve his appointment papers because he was not a member of the Massachusetts Bar.

Pill was classified as a "temporary consultant," receiving an hourly wage and no benefits but performing all duties of the desired position, from Sept. 1979 to Nov. 1980, when he passed the state bar exam.

Pill was the sole witness called the first day of the trial Michael Pill and (wife) Carol Holzberg vs. Madson, Benedict and assistant chancellor Bryan Harvey, which is expected to last at least through Thursday. U.S. District Court Judge Frank H. Freedman is presiding over six jurors, four men and two women, who will rule on the suit seeking $250,000 in damages.

Pill produced copies of job advertisements as evidence Massachusetts Bar membership had not been required during the search, though he noted discussion over membership in the Massachusetts Bar Association - "a trade association, rather than a court" - arose during a search committee interview. Later, when he received notification of appointment from the committee, an attached job description cited "membership in the bar," a phrase Pill said he interpreted to mean "an attorney with practical experience."

Pill said his membership in the Iowa State Bar, the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Iowa and the U.S. District Court for the District of Massachusetts qualified him to perform all duties of the LSO position. The job was to involve litigation and advice for the Student Government Association and other student groups.

SGA's Allen revokes threat of resignation

By LISA-MARIE CANTWELL
Collegian Staff

Charlene Allen said yesterday she has decided to stay on as Student Government Association (SGA) co-president, despite announcing three weeks ago that she intended to resign from the position for financial reasons.

"I am very surprised and pleased that I don't have to resign," Allen said yesterday. She said she originally threatened to resign due to rejected appeals for Massachusetts resident status, and the federal cut-backs in financial aid.

But Allen said yesterday that a recent meeting with the University Residency Board has given her "good reason to believe that my appeal will be approved."

Allen, who has lived most of her life in Massachusetts, but graduated from a New York high school, told the Undergraduate Student Senate three weeks ago that without in-state residency status and the reduced tuition that brings, she would have to quit her SGA position and "get a job that pays 40 hours a week," to finance her education.

State Dept. alters Grenadian story

ST. GEORGE'S, Grenada — U.S. officials in Grenada and Washington, after issuing conflicting reports about the finding of a mass grave, agreed Monday that no such grave has been found.

Earlier reports had suggested that a grave containing the bodies of slain Prime Minister Maurice Bishop and up to 150 other victims of a military coup had been discovered near the southern coast of this Caribbean island.

But Guy Farmer, chief spokesman for the U.S. State Department mission here, reached the department in Washington by telephone and then told reporters: 'There is no gravesite at this time. If someone finds a gravesite, please tell me."

He blamed poor communications between Grenada and Washington for the confusion and said rumors about a mass grave had been "very strong"

Chairman predicts republican Mass.

BOSTON AP - President Reagan's new state campaign chairman predicted Monday that Reagan will carry traditionally Democratic Massachusetts next year by a greater margin than he did in 1980.

State Sen. David H. Locke, assistant Senate Republican leader from Wellesley, opened Reagan's re-election campaign in Massachusetts Monday with announcement of the formation of the 1984 Reagan-Bush committee in the state.

Chairing the committee were several people including Nancy Bush Ellis of Lincoln, sister of Vice President George Bush.

In 1980, the Reagan-Bush ticket narrowly carried the state with 1,057,631 votes over incumbent Democratic President Jimmy Carter, who tallied 1,053,802. Democrats outnumber Republicans in the state, considered a liberal one in the past, by about 3-to-1.

Senate shafts $2.1b MX budget cut

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Senate today assured production of MX nuclear missiles, rejecting an amendment that would have cut construction funds from a $252.5 billion defense spending bill.

The vote was 56-37 against an amendment by Sen. Dale Bumpers, D-Ark., that would have deleted all $2.1 billion for production of the first 21 MX intercontinental missiles.

The House had approved the spending by a nine-vote margin last week.

Bumpers contended that placing the MX in fixed, alreadytargeted silos make them "highly destabilizing" to the nuclear balance with the Soviets and "heightens chances of a nuclear war."

He also argued that eventual deployment of 100 missiles, each bearing 10 warheads, was inconsistent with President Reagan's recent arms-control proposal to "build down" U.S. and Soviet warhead stockpiles to 5,000 on each side by retiring at least two warheads for each new one produced.

Environmentalists discover two new victims of acid rain

WEST TISBURY — A group of volunteer environmentalists said Monday they have found two biologically dead ponds and three others where life may expire soon because of acid rain on Martha's Vineyard Island.

"There are no fish or amphibious life in these two ponds," said William Marks. "And most likely there is no microsopic life as well. We determined this about two weeks ago.

"One is Harlick's Pond in West Tisbury, the other is Beetle Pond in Edgartown. At Harlick's we had a reading of 4.0 which was as acid as tomatoes, and at Beetle we had a reading of 4.3. With anything below 4.5, all fish are dead."

Marks said the six volunteers, including a retired New Hampshire chemist and an island biologist, set up a laboratory last spring at the island airport to develop a profile of island rain, ground water and surface water.

Supreme Court justices rule kids may testify in parents' trials

BOSTON — A sharply divided Massachusetts Supreme Court ruled Monday that a minor can be compelled to testify against a parent in a grand jury investigation of a murder case.

The justices, on a 4-3 vote, said three teen-agers could be forced to testify against their father, who was being investigated in connection with the disappearance of a young woman.

"We conclude that, in these circumstances, a minor child has no privilege to refuse to appear. Further, the child has no privilege to refuse to testify as to what he may have seen or heard, except perhaps as to confidential communications between the child and the parents..." the decision said.

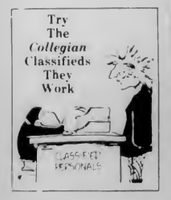
The names of the children and parent were not disclosed.

However, the defense attorney for William Douglas, a former Tufts University professor charged with murdering a 21- year-old woman, confirmed the court decision centered on the refusal of Douglas' children to testify against their father April 4, 1983, regarding their father's activities with Robin Benedict, a beautiful young woman who was last seen at Douglas' Sharon house March 5.

Panel to provide expert advice on media to warring military

WASHINGTON — A panel of experts is being assembled to advise the military on how to cooperate with the news media during combat in the wake of complaints about the Pentagon's barring reporters from the invasion of Grenada.

Gen. John W. Vessey Jr., chairman of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, said Sunday the advisory body will be headed by former Gen. Winant "Si" Sidle, who was chief spokesman for the Defense Department for two years during the Vietnam War.



Cambridge votes on nuke study

CAMBRIDGE — A hotly debated referendum that would outlaw work on space-age nuclear weapons in this university city comes up for a vote today, but results won't be known for several days — until all the paper ballots have been counted, by hand.

Local, national and even worldwide attention has focused on the Nuclear Free Cambridge Campaign, a drive to win voter approval for a binding local ordinance that would make it a crime to work on nuclear weapons and their components within city limits.

The nuclear-free campaign, spearheaded by Mobilization for Survival, has been campaigning door to door for months. Recently, a group called Citizens Against Research Bans began a well-financed media campaign attacking the referendum as an assault on First Amendment freedoms.

Seminar focuses on future of state institutions

Tuition increases possible

By JOHN O'CONNELL
Collegian Staff

Trustees and officials of public colleges and universities from across the commonwealth discussed the value of a state-wide tuition system proposed by the Board of Regents of Higher Education at a seminar on public education held Monday at the University of Massachusetts.

The tuition proposal, put forth by Regents Vice Chancellor for Academic Affairs Roger Schinness on Oct. 4, would set tuition levels between 25 and 33 percent of educational costs and mandates that tuition increases do not exceed 15 percent. Since the $1,129 paid by in-state residents at UMass is 29.4 percent of the cost of education here, tuition may increase under the proposal.

The Regents' plan would establish four catagories for setting tuitions: community colleges, state colleges, the regional state universities and the University of Massachusetts.

Schinness said this would be unfair to students at some schools, because some institutions have very high costs through no fault of their own, and some leeway is created by sharing the costs within a group.

UMass-Boston Chancellor Robert Corrigan said he does not think it fair to lump UMass-Boston with UMass-Amherst in the plan, since UMass-Amherst is a residential campus that's attracting more and more middle class students, while the average family income of students at UMass-Boston is below the poverty line.

Schinness said, "The amount of money we're talking about here is relatively small, (and UMass-Boston) has the right to apply for additional waiver funds."

Chancellor of Higher Education John B. Duff said the most effective policy is to have "the same tuition rates, but giving more tuition waivers to UMass-Boston."

The board heard other trustee concerns and Duff said he does "not think the Board has made up its mind at all," about the final plan.

Regents propose new policy

By TAMI BORTON
Collegian Staff

Provisions for declined enrollment and a shift to adult students should be the basis for long-term enrollment and curriculum planning in higher education, according to a report presented at a Massachusetts Board of Regents of Higher Education seminar held at the University of Massachusetts Monday.

The report, the third topic discussed among presidents and trustees from public colleges and universities across the commonwealth at the annual event, made policy recommendations resulting from a Regents' study which predicted the 43 percent fewer 18 year-olds in 1994 than in 1979 will mean less enrollment at that age level.

This decline will be slightly offset by a trend in adult or "non-traditional" students to attend higher education institutions, but some schools may have to close if the effect is too great, according to the report.

Nine recommendations made within the report entitled Shaping the Future of Massachusetts Higher Education: Demographic Changes and Enrollment Prospects, outlined steps to be taken by the Regents and Commonwealth institutions in an attempt to minimize the predicted effects.

The first step to be taken by institutions should be flexible enrollment planning and managements, Vice Chancellor for Planning and Program Development Peter Mitchell said at a press conference Monday.

Because of the expected scarcity of students and resources, "independent institutes must be more accountable and cooperative in adjusting to enrollment and consequential program change," he said.

Regents Director of Planning Laura Klausen explained this action would serve to prevent duplication of academic programs where unnecessary.

A recommendation for consolidation and elimination of courses within academic programs will result in higher quality and effectiveness of the programs before they are funded, according to the report.

The Regents will hold their regular monthly meeting here today.

Composite drawing of suspect provided

The Amherst Police Department have identified a suspect in at least two recent cases of indecent exposure as a thin white man between 17 and 21 years old, with straight brown hair and an acne-scarred face (see composite below).

Amherst detective John F. Burns said the man is suspected in "a couple" of exposure incidents which occured this weekend.

A female jogger near Puffer's Pond on State Street reported an incident of indecent exposure at about 3:15 Friday afternoon. Her description fits that of another alleged exhibitionist seen on Southeast Street by another jogger an hour later. The second woman helped police make the composite.

A third woman jogging on Strong Street Thursday also reported an indecent exposure incident.

In other police action:

Amherst Police arrested 10 people this weekend, seven of whom were charged with driving while intoxicated (DWI).

A 38-year-old Colonial Village man was stopped for speeding on Southeast Street, and charged with DWI. Police said he scored 0.24 on his breathalyzer test. A score of 0.1 means a suspect is legally drunk.

Lawyer blasts sports violence

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

A man, roughly six feet tall and weighing 190 pounds, comes up behind another man at a rapid pace and procedes to gouge at his eyes with a long slim piece of wood before banging his head three times upon a rock-like surface. A mugging maybe, or perhaps a gang fight? Not even close - it's a hockey game.

Such incidents, becoming common in professional sports today, were the focus of Attorney Richard Horrow's lecture on "Violence In Sports" last night before a standing-room only crowd of over 500 at the Student Union Ballroom.

Using films showing various acts of violence in pro sports and his own viewpoints, Horrow attempted to drum up support for a bill that would force professional leagues to punish players that intend to injure another player outside of the regular boundaries of the sport.

Horrow authored the Sports Violence Act of 1980 that was killed in committee by Congress that year, and is currently preparing a similiar bill that will appear on Capitol Hill in December, and is sponsored by at least four representatives.

Horrow's bill is intended to deter and punish, through criminal penalties, the episodes of excessive violence in professional sports. "I realize that violence is a part of football and hockey, I know that fact. I just don't think it should be carried to the extreme that there is intent to injure after the play is over," Horrow said.

Horrow said he was not trying to eliminate sports or throw athletes into jail, but wanted to separate criminal intent from normal sports related behavior, such as hockey checking or hard hits in football.

Students continue lobbying

Legislators praise SAFA efforts to increase aid

By PAUL BASKEN
Collegian Staff

WASHINGTON — In the first of two days on Capitol Hill, student lobbyists from the University of Massachusetts met Monday and planned today's meetings with the majority of the officers of the education subcommittees' members.

"I got good response from everyone we spoke to," said Cindy Howland, a 21 year-old junior political science major from Winchester, who as secretary of the group was making her third trip with Students Advocating Financial Aid (SAFA). "I was so impressed with how well my group performed," she said, noting that two-thirds of the 36-member group were on their first trip.

In a year of reauthorization of the higher education budget and facing an election year proposal by President Reagan to cut back student grant programs for higher education, James Quinn, a 23 year-old senior political science major from Longmeadow, said he was pleased by the overly good number of appointments with key members of the House.

"Overall we feel that maybe we're not changing their minds, but we're providing them with personal testimony — that's very important," said Quinn, whose lobbying team of four students met with the education aid to New Hampshire Republican Sen. Gordon Humphrey.

While the senator has never voted pro-education as determined by the United States Student Association, the aidcomplimented the "very professionally lobbying" by SAFA members, who for him "helped make some of the abstract ideas clear."

SAFA, which is in its fourth year at the university, is stressing in its meetings this semester what they see as four "major areas" of the higher education issue: President Reagan's support for increased merit scholarships as opposed to need-based scholarships; localization of the Pell Grant program; the federal funding level of campus-based funds such as work-study; and the issue of equal access to funds between public and private schools.

Later in the day, some SAFA members met with Sen. Paul Tsongas (D.-Mass.) to hear his praise of their efforts, which, while he said may not carry enormous weight, is nevertheless important.

"We get very little contact with students," said Tsongas, who admitted to paying off his student loan two years ago. "The kind of student activity I saw in the Sixties I just don't see anymore."

City offices given to UMass

By JILL LANG
Collegian Staff

Several University of Massachusetts departments may soon occupy office space in a Commonwealth-owned building in Springfield.

Although no decisions have been made about which departments will be granted permission to make the move, Associate Chancellor David C. Bischoff said there is a good chance that the School of Education will have an admissions office in Springfield.

He also mentioned office space for the School of Management.

"We want to establish a University presence in Springfield, and the decisions will be made carefully and thoughtfully," Bischoff said.

Bischoff said the building, which once housed the Springfield Post Office and a federal court, will not be ready for occupancy for a year to a year and a half.

When the federal government built new locations for the post office and the court, the Commonwealth bought the old building and made in available to the University, Bischoff said.

Besides office space for University departments, this new space will also be used to house offices of the Massachusetts Department of Environmental Quality Engineering--the Division of Water Pollution Control, now in Draper Hall, the Regional Office, now in the Public Health Building, and the Divisions of Hazardous Waste and Air Pollution, now located in the Springfield Hospital unit of the Baystate Medical Center.

Following Allen's announcement, the senate passed a resolution supporting her appeal to the residency board, and Allen said yesterday the pressure put on the board "has taken effect."

The senate resolution worked under the "service to state" consideration, one of a list of qualifications a residency applicant should meet in order to work towards a successful appeal, Allen said.

Allen said she also received loan offers from friends and UMass people. "So long as I can get by, I'm not going to quit," Allen said.

The announcement of her final decision was expected at last Wednesday's senate meeting. However, a walk-out, led by Third World Caucus members and involving over 20 senators along with co-presidents Allen and Tom Ahern, postponed that announcement.

The walk-out was in protest of a resolution which denounced the invasion of Grenada, and called for a troop withdrawal that was rejected by a majority of the senate.

"That is an important stance which affects us all," said Allen, who supported the resolution.

Why I like paying a little more

A year ago I became extensively involved in the campaign to Save the Bottle Bill and was actually looking forward to saving and returning my bottles and cans.

I am only mildly ashamed, if at all, to say I could count the number of empties I've returned since the law went into effect on one hand.

But I know I'm not alone, stories of bottles and cans becoming permanent fixtures in kitchens, pantries and sheds are always good for conversation.

Tami Borton

During early September transient friends either toted empties to their next dwelling or left them for future dwellers.

With aspirations of having a keg party at the end of the semester, my housemates stacked enough empty six packs to cover an entire wall, and the metallic clanking when my car rounds a corner is not a mechanical problem.

The noticeable improvement in the environment convinces me the new law is accomplishing what it set out to do, keep the land free of glass and metal.

While it is somewhat annoying to live among empty beverage containers, I chose to do so rather than return them.

When things get a little too crowded, I give the empties away. I, and many others, willingly pay higher prices for beverages either because we can rationalize the increase as inflational or we don't care.

In its own way, the bottle law is acting as a modern day Robin Hood, using these empties as the coins taken from the rich and given to the poor.

Whoever cashes in on my collection benefits from the extra money more than they suffer from the extra aggrevation. The proof is in the fact they bothered to do it. Mothers love the law when it means not being nickeled and dimed to death by Junior; just let him take care of the empties.

Even bottles that are thrown away have a good chance of bringing someone an extra nickel. Containers are plucked out of the landscape, so even if one is so inclined to toss one to the roadside, he probably won't feel guilty (not that he would anyhow.)

Bottles will also be pulled from trash cans, by either "bag people" or others like the well-dressed co-ed I witnessed.

Those who complain of the financial inconvenience have two alternatives, return empties or stop buying bottled beverages. With the exception of beer, finding favorite beverages sans container is easy (as easy as walking through the Hatch or any cafeteria.)

People whose greatest gripe with the law is the bother of returning empties must simply set their priorities. Is giving up soda worth the hassle saved?

Even the poor private store owner who has to contend with the returns is reimbursed the deposit he paid plus a penny or two. That miniscule margin can add up.

As I see it, anyone who bitches and moans about the bottle law should not be listened to. Getting around any inconvenience the new legislation causes is not hard, and our cleaner environment speaks louder than any of those curses. New York agrees with this logic.

Incidentally, my housemates had a nice little keg party financed by bottle deposits.

Boston mayor — a racy subject

Now that the two finalists for Boston's mayoral derby have been chosen, it has come time for us to turn our minds toward everyone's favorite question, "who will win?" At first glance Ray Flynn seems to be the clear favorite. Flynn and Melvin King both received about 29 percent of the overall vote in the primary. However their support came from entirely different voter segments. Despite his "rainbow coalition" rhetoric, King received 95 percent of the black vote, but far smaller numbers of white votes than either Flynn or third place finisher David Finnegan. In order to win the run-off King will have to do far better among white voters, while Flynn can win with virtually no black support.

Walter Branson

If one looks at the history of mayoral elections in other cities, particularly Chicago, it seems unlikely that either candidate will make significant inroads into the other's ethnic power base, thus making Ray Flynn Boston's next mayor. Faced with these facts one might be tempted to ask, "but what of the issues? Surely some voters must be concerned with something besides the particular ethnic group that these candidates happen to belong to?" Well the fact is, these two men are remarkably similar in their views. Both stand behind the little people who seem to have been left out of Boston's fast paced growth of recent years. Both men talk of shifting economic priorities away from downtown and back to the neighborhoods. Both men are concerned with ensuring equal access and equal opportunity for all of Boston's citizens. Yet the cold facts remain. Mel King is expected to capture something like 95 percent of the black vote, even as he did in the primary. That's 95 percent over a man who is broadcasting essentially the same message, and whom King himself professes to have great respect for. In contrast, many white voters will go to the polls next month with the express purpose of casting a vote for "one of their own."

True, great strides have been made. This campaign, so far, has been remarkably free of racial rhetoric and violence. But while we may be on the road we have only just begun the journey. I'm waiting for the day when voters will look first and last at a candidate's record, character, and stand on the issues, while looking at his or her ethnic background at all. I'm waiting for the day when no one will be able to say that "X got the black vote and Y got the white vote" because race will no longer be an important criteria for voter classification. I'm hoping for the day when we can kick back in our armchairs the day after the election, realize with surprise that we just elected our first Black, Chinese, or Puerto Rican mayor, and no one even noticed.

But maybe I'll be surprised. Maybe this will be the year.

Letters

Keeping issues in perspective

To the Editor,

I would like to respond to the comments and criticism raised by Peter Deliso (editorial Nov. 1) in reference to the editorial written by Bill Collins (Oct. 19). What at first seems to be an editorial letter written in defense of the culminating attacks upon the Student Government Association (SGA) and its leadership, Deliso's letter, quickly turns into an direct assault upon Collins. I am not, however, writing this letter simply in defense of the issues Mr. Collins "speaks" of; but in defense of Mr. Collins because of the issues "attributed" to him.

To begin with, Deliso's comments referring to Collins' "stand" against the Students Against Militarism seem unwarranted due to his own misinformation. What Mr. Collins actually said was, "the SGA continues to fund and address political issues of national and international proportions, not university issues such as: the lack of dormitory space, the lack of parking space, the quality of our education, oversubscribed courses, ineffective tenured professors, rising fees, tuition hikes and the re-paving of pot-hole-ridden on-campus roadways. When will the SGA realize the the Student Activities Trust Fund (SATF--to which each student contributes 96 dollars per year) fee is for student "activities" not student politics."

The function of the SGA is not to perform those political actions of the United Nations or the U.S. Senate, but to deal with issues pertaining to the University. The crises in Lebanon, Grenada and of those in Western Europe are not the responsibility of the SGA to tend to.

Secondly, Mr. Deliso states, "Mr. Collins attributes all the Senate ills to one radical group." In analysis of Mr. Collins' editorial, however, it is obvious and in evidence that such a phrase does not exist. Nor does Mr. Collins ever refer to any such radicals. He continues, "the SGA leadership has been accused of engaging in post sixties nostalgia. I submit that Mr. Collins and his 'associates' are guilty of post-fifties nostalgia. Their attitudes reflect the unquestioning acceptance of authority." It has been my experience that when an individual attacks the cause of a set of problems, attributing them to one particular person, he-she is sometimes ill-informed or lacks complete understanding. However, opinion is opinion.

Yet once again, it is apparent that Mr. Collins and his "associates", if any, or whoever they may be, continue to be harrassed by another letter writer who has failed to check the facts. The issue I bring up is merely to point out that it is time that students, especially those whose opinions are widely voiced, begin to speak through reason, not emotion. It is this presence of emotion that has hindered and shall continue to hinder the SGA, aspiring editorialists and students alike unless to coin an overly-used phrase, a greater objectivity can be achieved.

I suggest that Mr. Deliso first collect the facts before the mind is made up. Attack not a knowledge of which you have been ill-informed. Let us think, not simply react.

Finally, let us keep issues in perspective. Shall we?

John A. Nolan
SGA Senator

Misdirecting the blame

To the Editor,

In response to an editorial written by Dakin Ferris (Are Politics the Problem?), I would like to respond by saying that Mr. Ferris wrongly attacks SGA Co-President, Tom Ahern, by implying that he is stonewalling this Fall's Attorney General selection process. Ferris does this by first accusing Ahern of setting up "the most extensive advertisement process ever used." Second, he mentioned the fact that the AG application "deadline was extended two times."

Ferris, as ex-Acting Attorney General, should know better than to make grossly unfounded charges. Being familiar with the SGA Constitution, he should know that the selection committee is solely responsible for advertising, compiling and collecting applications, interviewing candidates, and presenting a pool of qualified candidates from which the SGA President may choose the new AG. It was this selection committee, an autonomous unit within the SGA structure, that was responsible for any delays that have taken place during the course of the selection process. Why is Mr. Ferris blaming the Presidents' Office?

As chairperson of the AG Selection Committee, I cannot get further involved in this ongoing debate. Let's put a halt to these divisive and senseless battles so that the AG's Office, and the entire SGA can get down to serious work.

Alternative and other radio

To the Editor,

I would just like to make a couple of corrections on the article on radio station WSYL which appeared in the Collegian on November 2.

First of all, WSYL Station Manager Wayne Carney (not Casney as reported) did not state that "WMUA is not as progressive as WSYL." Rather it is important to note that WSYL is primarily a campus station while WMUA is more community orientated. WSYL's programming consists primarily of "alternative rock" while WMUA programs a wider variety of musical forms, other than alternative rock, of which there may not be an audience for on campus (i.e. blues, jazz, polka, etc.) Secondly WSYL's broadcast frequency is not 89.9 but rather 89.7 on the FM band, a minor but important difference.

Lord makes audience feel

DO LORD REMEMBER ME
Hampden Theater
Friday, Nov. 4

By ALISON MALOON
Collegian Staff

The Third World Theater continued its fall 1983 season this past weekend with a production of Do Lord Remember Me, written by James De Jongh and directed by Roberta Uno Thelwell. The play set on a wicker porch of a retirement home in Virginia, focused on the memories of former slaves. Five actors who comprised the cast, spoke directly to the audience at times, as well as with each other. Flashbacks and songs were used to break up the pace of the dialogue.

"Wanna know about slavery? Well sit on that chair," said a cast member. And you sat on that chair and learned. The cast members were talented in their use of accent and movement, but their use of facial expression and eye contact highlighted their performances. The audience felt it was as if each actor had really lived through it all, felt all the pain that radiated from their eyes. The audience had no choice but to feel what these ex-slaves were feeling. At times I even wanted to stop looking and listening, to erase the pain, but the superb cast made this impossible: you were there to feel and you felt deeply.

Music also added much to the show. The cast, when recalling painful incidents, would start deep, mournful, gospel harmonies, then suddenly would break into upbeat, hand-clapping, feetstomping songs as if to snap themselves away from the misery; then the audience would join in enthusiastically.

The dialogue, which came partly from recorded interviews with former slaves, was powerful and encompassing. They discussed topics ranging from marriage, death and whippings, to masters, church and rebellion. The conversations would begin with rememberances of a child being sold to a trader and flow into the pleasure of eating hot cornmeal cakes, thus demonstrating how the smallest joys in the life of a slave were necessary to bear the overall pain of this "peculiar institution."

At times the production was very funny and musically uplifting but even while you were enjoying the show, the horrible underlying thought of slavery's reality would come back to haunt you. And although Do Lord Remember Me in itself was not a depressing show, I left the theater not only with a deeper knowledge of slavery but with a much deeper sense of guilt.

Richard Ammons and Felicia Thomas reminisce in a scene from Do Lord Remember Me.

'Cool' jazz sets FAC on fire

STAN GETZ WITH ASTRUD GILBERTO
Fine Arts Center
Thursday, Nov. 3

By ED BEEN
Collegian Staff

A near capacity crowd was treated to a living jazz legend in the form of saxophone great Stan Getz last Thursday night at the Fine Arts Center.

Getz, who along with Miles Davis and Gerry Mulligan originated "cool" jazz, played with intense warmth and conviction, and balanced his 65 minute set with beautiful ballads, and uptempo kickers.

On the ballad "My Old Flame," Getz showed why he is nicknamed "The Sound," as he exhibited his pure, liquid sonority. Other highlights of the evening included the Bill Evans waltz "Very Early," the uptempo "Tempus Fugit," and a moving Billy Strayhorn ballad that he dedicated to the memory of a childhood friend.

In keeping with his reputation, he continued to introduce new music, as two of the numbers were written by pianist Jim McNeely, part of the quartet introduced by Getz as a "world class band." He apologized for a back injury, and he seemed occassionally pained during the performance, but his extreme professionalism that he has maintained throughout his 40 year career, first with the Jack Teagarden Band, later with Jimmy Dorsey and Benny Goodman among others, prevailed.

Saxophonist Stan "the sound" Getz.

Introduced as the "Brazilian Bombshell," Astrud Gilberto proved not only that she is the queen of bossa nova, but that she is also a well rounded performer. During her 10 song — 50 minute set, Gilberto and her six piece band, highlighted by guitarist Emily Remler, and trombonist David Sax, the songs ran from Brazilian sambas to modern jazz-rock works.

Highlights of her set included "Let Yourself Go," written by Gilberto, "Meditation," a ballad that showed the soft whispery side of her voice, and "In The Mood" sung in Portuguese. She also did "Amazon," a song she just recorded for the new Michael Franks album.

After Stan Getz's set, he called Gilberto back on the stage to "take a walk down memory lane," and the duo recreated their 1963 number one hit "The Girl From Ipanema." The show ended with many of the audience members standing, and clapping, shouting for more, but this rare double bill treat was over. Hats off to the Duke Ellington Committee, and the Fine Arts Center for bringing quality entertainment to UMass. The fact that there were very few empty seats in the concert hall, proves Stan Kenton's famous statement "jazz is dead," dead wrong.

Watch for Andy Gordon's TRAILERS every Friday!

Stickers seeded third in NCAA tourney

By JILL LANG
Collegian Staff

The seedings for the 1983 NCAA field hockey tournament were released Monday and they are just as everyone expected them to be, with one small exception: the University of Massachusetts is seeded third above Iowa and the University of New Hampshire.

After Saturday's tie against UConn, coach Pam Hixon seemed confident that her team would receive the fourth seed and a bye into the quarterfinals of the tournament. She made no mention of the possibility of a third seed.

"I wasn't really surprised," Hixon said. "Iowa lost 4-3 to Northwestern on Saturday and so they dropped Iowa to number four and moved us up to three. That loss (Iowa) definitely helped us."

UMass is in a bracket with the University of Pennsylvania and Temple University. The Minutewomen will play the winner of that matchup Sunday at the University of Pennsylvania.

Hixon said receiving the third seed should have meant a home field advantage for the quarterfinal match. However, she saw two reasons for her team to travel to Philadelphia, the site of the semi-finals and finals.

The first is the condition of the NOPE field, and the second is that having UMass travel to Philadelphia instead of having both UPenn and Temple travel to Amherst saves the NCAA money.

"It makes sense," Hixon said.

The coach said the stickers will be in Philadelphia to watch the Temple/UPenn game.

"It's always nice to scout your opponent before a game," she said.

In preparation for Sunday's game UMass will scrimmage against Springfield at Springfield, as well as arrive a day early at UPenn in order to practice on the turf.

Former Minutewoman Sue Caples, now a coach at West Chester State, has offered Hixon the opportunity to have the two teams scrimmage before the game on Sunday.

"It's really nice that people are helping us out and supporting us," Hixon said.

Here are the other tournament brackets:

UCONN, no. 1, will play the winner of University of New Hampshire and Penn State. Both games are at UConn.

OLD DOMINION, no. 2, will play the winner of North Carolina and California State Berkeley. Both games are at O.D.U.

IOWA, no. 4, will play the winner of Northwestern and San Jose State. Both games are at Iowa.

Runners finish in top five

By M E MURRAY
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts men's and women's cross-country teams were in action over the weekend, competing in regional events that drew hundreds of runners from the northeast region.

Saturday, the men finished fifth overall at the New Englands held at Franklin Park in Boston where approximately 280 runners from 43 schools covered the five mile course.

Tops for the Minutemen were: Rod LaFlamme (14th, 24:27), Rick Doiron (27th, 24:54), freshmen Paul Stanislawzyk and Wayne Levy (38th and 49th, 25:09 and 25:20 respectively) and Tom Carleo (50th, 25:21).

Coach Ken O'Brien said LaFlamme ran his best race ever and commended the freshmen that ran for their outstanding performances.

"When you consider that it was a championship meet and it was run in bad weather, they handled the situation very well."

O'Brien explained that he and freshmen running Coach Randy Thomas had felt as early as last summer that the incoming junior varsity runners could aid the injury-depleted Minuteman squad. The coach pointed out that last weekend's results show that six of the top five Minutemen finishers were freshmen.

UMass edged out the Universities of New Hampshire and Rhode Island in the final team standings and are now preparing for next weekends IC4A's, an NCAA qualifying meet to be held at Lehigh University next Saturday.

Meanwhile, at the ECAC Division I championship meet at Eastern Connecticut State University, the UMass women's cross-country team cruised to a third-place team finish behind James Madison and St Johns University.

The team missed Kim Baker who was sidelined with a stress fracture and will miss next weeks NCAA qualifier at the University of Vermont.

Senior Dana Mikesell finished third overall, first among the UMass entries, covering the 3.1 mile course in 18:24. Junior Co-Captain Maureen O'Reilly has been injured of late but still managed a surprising second among the Minutewomen and 11th overall in 18:51.

She was followed by Sally Howes (12th, 18:52), Chris Pratt (13th, 18:56), and Deirdre Doyle (14th, 19:04).

Only one team from next weekend's qualifier will advance to the Nationals to be held at Lehigh November 21st, along with the top three finishers from other teams.

The Minutewomen may not match up well on paper with powerhouses such as Boston College, Boston University, and Yale competing but will be running with the best of them Saturday in Vermont.

Soccer suffers loss to Maine

By MIKE LEVINE
Collegian Staff

Remember that awful soccer article in the Halloween issue of the Collegian? That's right--the one which said that head Coach Jeff Gettler and the engineering department would install movable goalposts at Boyden Field for next season.

Well, after Sunday's 1-0 loss at the University of Maine at Portland, those goalposts may very well become a reality unless the 3-10-5 Minutemen can redeem themselves against Harvard this afternoon at 2:00 Boyden Field.

The Maine match was the latest in a string of games in which the Minutemen have dominated the action but have not been able to come up with more than one goal.

According to Coach Gettler, "We went through them like Swiss cheese. You can't play any better than we did."

The Minutemen outshot UMP by the wopping count of 21-9. However, of their 21 shots, the Minutemen could only manage to put four of them on net.

Obviously, if UMass has any intention of beating the 5-4-3 Crimson this afternoon, that percentage of shots-on-goal will have to go up. In addition, the Minuteman defense will have to do a good job against Harvard's big front line.

Havard's roster includes six players from foreign countries--two from England, and one each from Scotland, Canada, Italy, and the Netherlands. Add UMass forward Kayvan Khatami, from Iran, and you have the makings of a multinational invasion of Amherst.

Game time is 2:00 PM for this intrastate battle. After today's game and Saturday's season-finale against Hartwick, it should be known whether or not Dean James John of the engineering department will be getting a call from Coach Gettler any time soon.

Winning is not everything. At least it was not at the 14th annual gymnastics Alumni Meet on Saturday night. Everyone who was at the meet found it was not a question of winning or losing but who was having the most fun.

For the University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics team, the meet was a chance to warm up for the season and a chance to have fun while introducing new tricks. The Minutemen hit a few of them and missed a few, but Coach Roy Johnson said that after the team cleans up the rough spots he will be looking forward to a successful season.

The UMass women's gymnastics team used the meet simply to have a fun time.

"It was a good time had by all," Coach Ken Anderson said. "I wasn't expecting anything. I was very pleased with the turnout of the alumni and friends who came to watch."

For the Minutewomen, Karen Knapp returned from last year's team to help out the alumni. John Macurdy and Bob Goulart, who also graduated last semester, came back to compete for the men alumni.

The UMass team still have a month to go before beginning their seasons. The men will start out by traveling to West Point to take on their rival, Army, on December 3rd. The women will begin on Dec. 2nd by hosting New Hampshire, Connecticut, Northwestern and Rhode Island in the UMass Invitational.

Oh, by the way, the Minutemen did pull out a victory over the alumni by a few points. However, the Minutewomen could not do the same as the returning alumni showed they could still do their stuff.

Discrimination suit continues against UMass

By RITA MURPHY
Collegian Staff

Despite coming to a "workable solution for the immediate future," the associate director of the Office of Planning and Budget said she still plans on continuing her sexual discrimination charge against the University of Massachusetts.

Rosemarie Strother, who filed the charge against the University with the Massachusetts Commission Against Discrimination and the Federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission last May, said she and acting director of the office Paul Page discussed her position last week for the first time.

"It was a very positive, very open meeting," which she said made her feel somewhat better about her situation.

In September, Strother told the Collegian she felt as if she was "demoted" following the appointment of Page to the position vacated by Marie Reid, who is on a one-year leave of absence.

Page was chosen to replace Reid despite Strother's position of associate director.

The choice was made by John L. DeNyse, vice chancellor for Administration and Finance.

DeNyse was named in the discrimination suit.

Strother said then that her old job responsibilities were replaced with a new job description which was "a very major difference" from her old one.

At the meeting held last Wednesday, Strother said she and Page came "to a compromise of sorts" on her job description.

"I'm not getting my old duties back, but I'm beginning to get more projects which nobody seems to have the time to develop," she said.

Page said he did not want to comment on the matter while it is still in the hands of the federal and state employment discrimination agencies.

"She's an employee of mine and we have always worked as professionals...there has never been a problem from my perspective (on working together) and I think from hers, too," Page said.

Strother said she still plans on seeing the suit through to the end.

"Maybe some other woman will profit from all of this," she said.

Strother said she is now "resigned to the situation," but that "doesn't mean I'm accepting it."

"I'm trying to make something positive out of a negative situation. I'm a contributing member of the staff and always have been," she said.

Page said he has had no "qualms about her job performance."

Strother said Page has realized that there is "a lot of talent here and he has taken the trouble to listen to me."

Despite the emotional stress she has been under since filing the charges, Strother said she is optimistic.

"I still intend on winning. I still don't know what winning will mean other than maybe personal satisfaction," she said.

LSO attorneys not on State Bar

By ANNE McCRORY
Collegian Staff

SPRINGFIELD - At least five University of Massachusetts Legal Services Office staff attorneys hired since 1975 were not members of the Massachusetts Bar, it was revealed yesterday in the trial where an LSO attorney claims his lack of such membership prevented him from attaining a professional position in that office in 1979.

Witness testimony and personnel records called on the second day of the trial Michael Pill and Carol Holzberg vs. Dennis Madson, Larry Benedict and Bryan Harvey showed LSO Directing Attorney Ira Horowitz and staff attorneys Michele Leaf, Ozell Hudson, Sally Shalfont and Fay Chu had not been admitted to the state bar prior to their LSO employment.

Leaf and Horowitz were members of other state bars when appointed to their professional positions, and were later admitted to the Massachusetts Bar. Pill was a member of the Iowa Bar, a federal Iowa court and the U.S. District Court in Massachusetts when seeking a similar professional position. He was denied full pay and benefits for 15 months until he passed the state exam and is now seeking $250,000 in compensatory and punitive damages.

Former LSO managing attorney Steven Baumohl, a member of the search committee when Pill applied for the position as Student Government Association counsel, said the committee discussed Pill's lack of bar membership and how it would affect his job ability.

"If the students wanted to hire a litigator, that was not in Mr. Pill's background," Baumohl said. "He was not a litigator, not a court person, but others in the office had those skills. (Pill's qualities) were interfaced with strengths and weaknesses of other attorneys...he knew the University quite well involving dealing with the administration and various student groups."

Baumohl said Pill's federal bar membership would allow him to litigate if necessary because "most University suits would most likely be filed in federal court."

Baumohl said he approached Benedict over Pill's temporary consultant status, among other personnel problems, and argued that while Pill did not fulfill "the bar" requirement of his job description, that description was "improper, (having) added qualities not required by the search committee." Later, while "bantering," Baumohl said Benedict told him Pill was "not popular" in Whitmore.

No defense witnesses have yet been called during the week-long trial.

Regents propose $504.6M budget for 1985

By JOHN O'CONNELL
Collegian Staff

The Board of Regents of Higher Education unveiled their preliminary 1985 budget recommendations for the state higher education system and gave "qualified" approval to long range plans for the University of Massachusetts and five state and community colleges at their monthly meeting held here Tuesday.

The Regents are proposing a $504.6 million higher education budget to Gov. Michael S. Dukakis. Regents Administration and Finance Committee member David S. Paresky said the preliminary request is just the beginning of "a long and complicated process" of budget approval which should end in July, and budget breakdowns for each school will be worked out after that.

The Regents' proposal is an increase of $48 million over the 1984 higher education budget. Of that increase, $25 million will pay for new engineering, computer science, health sciences and business programs in state higher education institutions, according to Vice Chancellor for Academic Affairs Roger Schinness. The state scholarship reserve is also increased by $10 million in the Regents' plan.

Schinness said the Regents budget recommendations, with calculations for collective bargaining raises, represent a 15 percent increase over this year's budget, which "is about average."

Earlier in the meeting, Chancellor of Higher Education John B. Duff noted the "marvelous turnaround in the last two years," in higher education over that time "makes us first in the nation" for improved higher education support, Duff said.

Peresky said former Gov. Edward J. King's education policies were "misunderstood" by students, and King's support, along with state education committees, was largely responsible for increasing the state education budget.

The Regents also gave "qualified approval" to long range plans for the University of Massachusetts, Salem State College and several community colleges at yesterday's meeting.

Janet Eisner, chair of the Regents Committee on Planning and Resource Development, said "qualified approval means there are some points that need further development" in the plans.

The long range plan for this campus was approved by the UMass Board of Trustees Oct. 5. The plan is "not a specific five-year plan, but an outline for planning," according to Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey.

In other business, the Regents approved two tuition retention programs like the one proposed by Duffey earlier this semester and rejected by the Trustees last week.

Students at the University of Lowell and Westfield State College will face 15 percent tuition hikes next semester under the approved programs. Lowell students will have to pay a $74 increase to pay for new laboratory equipment and added classes in popular majors, and Westfield students will pay $63 more next semester to help pay for construction projects on campus.

None of the Regents questioned the increases, and Duff said later that they had "discussed (the retention program) off and on, and we agreed to try a pilot program at two or three schools."

AROUND THE WORLD

Reagan lauds Asia's 'Yankee spirit'

ANCHORAGE — President Reagan, heading for six days of trade and defense talks in Japan and South Korea, predicted Tuesday that the United States would forge vastly stronger bonds with Asian nations, which "have the Yankee spirit we once called our own."

Reagan spoke to several thousand airmen and their families who crowded into a hangar at snow-shrouded Elmendorf Air Force Base, where the president made a brief refueling stop en route to Tokyo.

The next century, Reagan said, could see "vastly expanding economic, political, and cultural bonds with these countries" of northeastern Asia and the Pacific.

"I believe we will witness a wave of productive and creative endeavors improving the quality of life on both sides of the Pacific," he said.

AROUND THE NATION

Senate forges on in wake of bomb

WASHINGTON — FBI agents combed through an estimated $1 million mound of debris Tuesday as the Senate attempted business as usual in the wake of a bomb blast that ripped through a hallway and severely damaged a meeting room near the chamber. Officials said the device was triggered by a wristwatch.

"The Senate will not be deterred or intimidated," declared Majority Leader Howard H. Baker Jr., R-Tenn., as he held the Senate to a schedule which began at 9 a.m. EST.

Baker said that had the Senate been in session at the time of the explosion, there would have been "grave injury ... and, perhaps, loss of life to senators and staff."

Kids flood out Maryland business

JOPPA, Md. — Four youths spent two to three days digging through an earthen dike, finally releasing a 6 million-gallon, five-acre flood into a sand and gravel pit, authorities said Tuesday.

"For kids, it was a tremendous feat," Larry Stancill, president of Harford Sands Inc., said of the vandalism that has stalled his company's sand and gravel business.

"I don't think you could have gotten them to work that hard for pay," he said.

The boys, aged 12 to 17, were charged with malicious destruction of property and placed in their parents' custody pending an investigation by juvenile authorities, said Sgt. William Van Horn, a spokesman for the Harford County Sheriff's Office. The youths' names were not released.

AROUND THE REGION

Alcohol treatment program grows

BOSTON — An alcohol treatment program for repeat drunken drivers, plagued by an 11-week waiting list, got state approval Tuesday to expand to 131 beds.

The Public Health Council unanimously approved Rutland Heights Hospital's request to expand the 14-day residential treatment program, mandated by a year-old drunken driving law to treat two-time offenders.

The treatment program, serving offenders across the state, is currently operating with 88 beds under a one-year exemption from council review, according to Linda Clancy of the public health Determination of Need (DON) staff.

The 14-day residential rehabilitation program offers an alternative to a seven-day jail stay, which is the penalty for those convicted of drunken driving twice within six years.

Ms. Clancy told the council the increase in beds is needed to meet the demand. She said currently there are 535 people on a waiting list for the Rutland program, yielding an 11- week wait between referral and admission.

Doctors must report AIDS cases

BOSTON — Cases of AIDS, the often-fatal disease that robs its victims of their immune system, must now be reported to the state, under a mandate Tuesday by the Public Health Council.

The council voted unanimously to add AIDS — acquired immune deficiency syndrome — to a list of five diseases that physicians and hospitals are required to report directly to the state Department of Public Health. In the past, AIDS cases were reported voluntarily.

The emergency regulation goes into effect immediately.

"Adoption of this regulation will enable the department to track incidences of AIDS statewide through the Division of Communicable and Venereal Diseases, and conduct epidemiologic investigations of all reported cases," the department's staff said in a memo to the council.

The information will be forwarded to the U.S. Centers for Disease Control in Atlanta where the disease, which has struck 35 Massachusetts residents since 1981, is being studied. Eighteen of those 35 cases in the state ended in death, according to the department.

"With the appropriate information, possibly we can get to the root of the problem," Donna E. Levin, DPH deputy general counsel, told councilors at a Statehouse meeting.

Men suspected of plotting takeover

INDIANAPOLIS - Three men arrested on charges of making a bomb may have planned to forcibly "take over" their hometown of Clayton, a community of 700 residents, officials said Tuesday.

A federal agent testified about the alleged takeover plan in a bond hearing for the suspects, Rawleigh Wilson, Jay H. Wright and Shane Pringle, U.S. Magistrate Thomas Faulconer said Tuesday.

Faulconer said James Quearry, an agent of the U.S. Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms division of the Treasury Department, "testified that there was a plan to take over the town."

Ms. Martha Collins takes Kentucky

AP — Democratic Lt. Gov. Martha Layne Collins of Kentucky claimed an easy victory Tuesday night to become the only woman among 50 state governors, while the widow of slain Rep. Larry McDonald fell behind in a Georgia congressional race in elections certain to be sifted for clues to national balloting still a year ago.

In Washington state, appointed GOP Sen. Dan Evans was on the ballot seeking an extension of his two-month term in the Congress. And in a featured city hall race in Philadelphia, W. Wilson Goode, the son of a sharecropper, was favored to become the first black elected to lead the nation's fourth largest city.

Workers vacate after women complain

By MICHELLE HYDE
Collegian Staff

Building Operations workers were noticeably absent from their perch in the University of Massachusetts Campus Center Tuesday after Student Activities workers complained Monday about their presence there.

According to the women, the men sit in the hallway near the barber shop in the Campus Center and watch women as they walk by and sometimes whistle and make sexist remarks.

But following a Collegian article Tuesday the men were gone from the area for most of the day.

Eunice Konieczny, office manager of the Student Government Association (SGA), said the women who work in the (SAO) office made a habit of walking through the Student Union Building, outside, and in the Campus Center entrance to avoid the men's stares.

"It is really intimidating," she said.

Dakin Ferris, a UMass student, who said he noticed the men sitting there before, said, "I'm insulted that they would be so blatant about what they do."

Forest Davies, assistant manager of Building Operations, said after a discussion in his office the men decided not to sit there.

"I think everybody somewhat agrees with what was said (by the women), but it was the first time they heard anything about sexual harassment."

UMass defines sexual harassment as "any unwanted or inappropriate sexual attention...that can make a person uncomfortable on the job or in the academic or living environment and includes looks, leering, innuendos, verbal abuse, and remarks about a person's clothing."

Howard Gadlin, the UMass Ombudsperson, said the conduct of the men does constitute sexual harassment.

"I see it as a problem if some people are experiencing it as such," he said.

Tom Ahern, SGA co-President, said Tuesday he plans to write a letter to Davies "concerning the fact that it's pretty obvious that it (the conduct) is harassing to the women."

Davies said he understands the women's complaint, but that he would be "infringing on their human rights by dictating where they (the men) should spend their breaks."

Congress backs student aid

By PAUL BASKEN
Collegian Staff

WASHINGTON--The director of student financial aid services for the Department of Education yesterday told a lobbying group from the University of Massachusetts that despite the Reagan Administration's recommendation, Congress' support of eight aid programs is too strong for them to be seriously cut this year or next.

"(Student aid) receives consistent support from both sides of the aisle no matter who is in the White House," said James Moore, describing to members of Students Advocating Financial Aid (SAFA) the strong bi-partisan backing such programs enjoy on Capitol Hill.

Although now working in the Reagan Administration, Moore questioned why the President submitted a budget with zero funding for three federal aid programs to Congress, since "you (should) come up here (Capitol Hill) with budgets that have a chance, or you're wasting your own time and theirs."

SAFA Director Gerald Grady of the UMass political science department said the group's seventh Washington trip, which was the first for two thirds of the 35 lobbyists, was different this year because of the record of support Congress has shown them.

"It wasn't 100 percent sure that his budget was going to be defeated," Grady said of Reagan's first spending plan made in 1981, the year after his election, when SAFA made its first lobbying trip. "And that's when we came on the scene, and it helped," Grady said.

Group members spent Monday and yesterday visiting individual Congressional and senatorial offices, reaching the majority of members of both Houses' higher education authorizing subcommittees, including several from Massachusetts.

In describing the supportive attitude on Capitol Hill as well as the election year politics that made this trip "not more challenging but a bit more exciting for the group," Grady concurred with Moore that the political emphasis on education in recent years is beginning to pay off.

"When we put the (fiscal year) '84 budget together we got the message from (Office of Management and Budget Director) David Stockman that we didn't want the same kind of trouble we got in (fiscal year) '83," Moore said.

"This is all right except that it doesn't allow much for growth," Moore noted of recent federal financial aid budgets, which while being saved from cuts, have generally failed to grow with inflation.

"The idea of free education for everybody in this country I think is going to be as extinct as a dinosaur in a few years," he said.

Ahern to appoint new attorneygeneral

By TOM MIDDLETON and JOHN O'CONNELL
Collegian Staff

Student Government Association Co-President Tom Ahern said he will appoint a permanent student attorney general at tonight's Undergraduate Student Senate meeting.

"I think the person I appoint will be able to handle the job," Ahern said, but he would not disclose the candidate's name until he presents it to the senate for approval.

The person appointed will need "dedication and knowledge of the legal system," Ahern said. "They must be able to work with the Legal Services Office, have knowledge of the University student judicial system, and a lot of energy."

The Attorney General Selection Committee concluded its selection process on Monday, Oct. 31 committee Chair Robert Teixeira said. The Southwest Area Government (SWAG) assembly unanimously passed a resolution last Thursday which demanded that Ahern appoint a permanent attorney general, noting that there is a vacancy currently in the office which has existed in one form or another for several years, and that the SGA constitution mandates that an attorney general be appointed within three weeks of a vacancy.

"Failure to appoint an attorney general within a prescribed period is an impeachable offense," the motion states, and the assembly "will take all actions necessary and proper," if Ahern does not appoint an attorney general.

Ahern said he agrees with the motion and SWAG's action.

"I'm glad they're participating," he said.

The attorney general selection committee had extended the search twice because they felt they did not receive enough applications, Teixeira said. Two of the five original applicants withdrew from selection because of the publicity involved and for personal reasons Teixeira said.

"The committee's responsibility is to present Tom Ahern with a list of qualified candidates in ranked order," said Teixeira.

Ahern said he did not think there would be any problems with the appointment. "Some members of the committee think they should have more time, but our overriding concern is in appointing an attorney general," Ahern said.

Grenada teach-in at New Africa House

By CAMDEN PIERCE
Collegian Correspondent

In a teach-in last night at the New Africa House, the recent invasion of Grenada was discussed by a panel of four. The discussion, sponsored by a number of local and University organizations, was about why the U.S. invaded Grenada, and what the implications of the invasions are.

Marea Wexler, a member of the Amherst Chapter of the U.S.-Grenada Friendship Society, moderated the event. She introduced the four panelists, allowing them each time to develop different perspectives on the invasion, before allowing questions from the audience.

The first panelist to speak, John Bracey, Professor of Afro-American Studies at UMass, described the invasion in an historical context. The invasion of Grenada can only be understood as a manifestation of expansionist American policy stretching back to the Revolutionary War. "Empire is the precondition of democracy" in America, he said. "You have to understand the twentieth century and the problems of race, class, and the politics of exploitation. The U.S. is not a paper tiger...and has no moral restrictions" in pursuing a policy to guarantee democracy for white Americans. He said that in the Caribbean basin this means "keeping black people and revolutionary ideas from being in the same place."

Michael Thelwell, professor of Afro-American studies and author of the book The Harder They Come, put the invasion in a more immediate context. He said the invasion was "an expression of will." It's an expression of a mentality in which a world power must act like a world power. "It represents the absence of any kind of foreign policy on Reagan's part. The invasion represents a failure of foreign policy," Thelwell said.

In Thelwell's opinion, the sequence of events leading to the invasion of Grenada suggests that Reagan was looking for a "short term success" to divide American attention from the situation in Lebanon. George McKenzie, a member of the Third World Caucus of the Student Senate, and Manuel Pastor, a Cuban-American graduate student in economics, concurred with Thelwell.

Pastor dismissed the accusation of administration officials that Cubans on the island were heavily armed troops, and said that the allegation that the airport was to be used to "export Communism" was an example of "the big lie: if you lie enough it becomes truth." He defended the presence of the Cubans in Grenada as being requested by the Grenadian government. He said that if the U.S. had pursued justifiable foreign policy, the Cubans wouldn't have been asked to build the airport in the first place.

UMass can wait on coal removal

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

Because of a proposal by University officials, the Amherst Conservation Commission has voted to lift a cease-and desist order that barred UMass from adding coal to the pile at Tillson Farm.

The plan, written by Associate Vice Chancellor Jack Littlefield, calls for the 45,000 ton heap to be cut to a manageable 12,000 tons by late May or early June.

"We were looking at a long range solution and they (the Conservation Commission) forced us to move a little quicker with their order," Littlefield said. "We are looking for a place off campus to store the coal and will put this out to bid soon."

The Commission issued the University the order on July 12th under the State's Wetlands Protection Act as an effort to stop pollution from seeping into nearby Taylor Brook. The pile first came under fire in the late 1970's when local farmers complained about the condition of the water.

"We needed some time to come up with a solution and I hope this will eventually solve the problems," Littlefield said. Littlefield also said that he did not know when the coal would be moved off campus.

$1000 car stereo stolen

By GREG BROWN
Collegian Staff

Amherst Police reported the theft this weekend of a car stereo valued at $1,000 from an unlocked car on University Drive. The victim reported a Sony XR-70 AM-FM stereo cassette player missing.

Police also reported the arrest Monday of a 22-year-old Brittany Manor resident who allegedly beat up his girlfriend Monday morning. Amherst Police arrested him at about 5 p.m. and charged him with assault and battery.

Continuing this weekend's report of driving while intoxicated (DWI) arrests:

Police arrested a 23-year-old man from New York City, Sunday at 1:15 a.m., after stopping him on Southeast Street for "erratic operation", and charged him with DWI.

A UMass student from Saugus, 21, was stopped Saturday at 1:30 a.m. on East Pleasant Street after striking a curb, and was charged with DWI. He scored 0.16 on the breathalyzer test.

A 16-year-old Colrain youth was arrested and charged with DWI, being a minor in possession of alcohol, running a red light and having no license. This occurred at 1:30 a.m. Sunday on Lincoln Avenue.

A 21-year-old Swiss Village woman was charged with DWI at 3 a.m. Saturday after scoring 0.17 on the breath test.

Stopped for speeding Friday night on Belchertown Road, an 18-year-old from Needham was arrested and charged with DWI.

A Randolph man, 20, was arrested at 3:20 a.m. Sunday on North Pleasant Street after being observed operating erratically, and charged with DWI, failure to stay within marked lanes and having no inspection sticker.

In other police action:

Amherst dogs killed $50 worth of livestock this weekend in two separate incidents. A brooking hen valued at $10 on Belchertown Road and two piglets worth $40 were killed.

A woman's purse and coat were reported stolen from under a table at Poor Richard's about midnight Saturday. The full-length black woolen coat was valued at $200, and the purse had $25 in it.

The Significance of Jesse Jackson's Presidential Candidacy to Democratic Politics in America

Mayor Richard Gordon Hatcher

Thursday, November 10, 1983, 2:00 p.m.
Campus Center, Room 1009
University of Massachusetts at Amherst

Mayor Hatcher of Gary, Indiana, was recently elected to his fourth term. He is past president of both the U.S. Conference of Mayors and the National Conference of Black Mayors. Currently, he is chairman of TransAfrica, the African and Caribbean affairs lobby in Washington, D.C., and Chairman of Jesse Jackson's Presidential Advisory Committee.

Vet Day combines history, emotion

Veterans' Day is soldiers' memorial

By MARY ANNE BEEN
Collegian Staff

November 11, 1918 was a day of great rejoicing. World War I was over and the boys were coming home after four years of fighting. The American people initially set aside this day to celebrate the end of World War I. The tradition was eventually carried on to include World War II, the Korean War and the Vietnam War.

"As a historian, World War I was the worst and most horrible war," said Robert A. Hart, University of Massachusetts history professor. "12 million lives were taken in this useless, meat grinder war."

"The 6,000 lives taken right before the agreed ending of the war at 11 a.m. November 11 is symbolic of the uselessness of the war. Apparently at 10 a.m. some fool started a barrage of gunfighting and 6,000 men lost their lives in the hour before the end of the war," Hart said.

According to Art Hillson, director of Veterans Assistance and Counseling Service (VACS), the United States has a great responsibility to those who have risked their lives for the country.

"We have veterans who are a lot worse off than those buried in the cemeteries," Hillson said. "Our government owes an enormous debt to those who have put their lives on the line in the name of America."

"The country is remiss in this obligation. The government is so apt to forget the veterans on their return," Hillson said.

"Veterans are truly the unsung heroes."

Young people may not be able to relate to this national holiday, Hart said, because the farther away or more removed one gets from a particular event, the less significance it tends to have.

"World War I happened a long time ago. Veterans from World War II, the Korean War and Vietnam War are to be remembered, also," Hart said.

"The government will now have a responsibility to veterans of Lebanon, Beirut and Grenada," Hillson said. "The observance of the national holiday will continue."

Dealing with shock, Coping with experience

By REBECCA THATCHER
Collegian Staff

An 18-year-old high school graduate enlists in the army because his only experience with war is his father's "noble enterprise" in World War II. After a few months of boot camp, he is sent to Vietnam where death is a way of life. He makes friends with a fellow soldier and the next day he watches his friend die. He finds himself standing up to his knees in the entrails of his fellow soldiers.

After six months, he returns to the U.S., lucky to be alive, but unlike his father, he is labeled "baby killer instead of a "hero."

Such is the typical scenario of a candidate for the recently recognized pattern known as Post Traumatic Stress Syndorme, said Art Hilson, director of the Veterans Assistance and Counseling Service at the University of Massachusetts. Hilson said this type of person does not want anybody to know he served in Vietnam, but he needs to talk to somebody.

"All this pressure builds up, finally after three or four years it starts to explode, he may become violent or turn to drugs."

An ordained minister as well as a Ph.d. in counseling, Hilson said the stress syndrome had previously been associated with victims of car accidents, but became a noticable trend with veterans of the Vietnam War.

"Every war that this country has been in, the warrior has come home a hero, but in this instance, the warrior was condemned," Hilson said.

"Almost every veteran who served in Vietnam has some sort of Post Traumatic Stress Syndrome," said UMass student David Miner, a veteran who served as a medic in Vietnam.

Veterans organize on campus

There are more than 500 veterans of the Vietnam War on campus. Some of them have organized the Veterans Service Organization, a Registered Student Organization which works to inform veterans on campus of available scholarships and legislation affecting veterans.

"Post Traumatic Stress Syndrome and Agent Orange are two of the main issues confronting veterans of campus today," said Peter Zenello, president of the V.S.O.

Zennello said the organization has 30 active members who try to serve as a voice for veterans on campus.

"We try to make sure that veteran students are aware of the pending legislation that may affect them, like the legislation that denied PELL grants to veterans.

The Veterans Assistance and Counseling Service, located in Hampshire House, provides many services such as tutors, emergency loans, and information. The office is staffed almost entirely by veterans.

"The greatest asset to the VACS has been the veterans on campus who volunteer to assist their peers. Without them, we would not have been able to accomplish anything worthwhile," Hilson said.

The VACS also has an outreach program, Hilson said, designed to inform veterans of the programs at UMass and to encourage them to attend UMass.

"We write to area veterans and suggest that if they decide to use their benefits, then they should consider coming to this school," he said.

Vets express concern

Hilson said that anybody who had served in the Vietnam War would have concerns and questions about the United States involvement in Grenada.

"It is a matter of policy, there are two sides; I personally oppose the imposition of one form of government upon another. But if on one hand a country has called for assistance and they are part of an allied consortium, then it's understood that allies respond to a request from allies," he said.

The Veterans Service organization has not taken a stand on the issue because they are an apolitical organization, Zenello said.

"We represent a wide range of politics," he said.

Miner disagreed with Hilson. "I am against aggression period," he said. But, he said, the U.S. government has still not finished its job in Vietnam.

"The government is still not doing everything it can," Miner said.

"We are trying to establish information on POW's and MIA's because there are too many unconfirmed reports. Personally, I think numbers are immaterial, if there are Americans alive over there, even if there is only one, the government should be making efforts to bring them home," he said.

Bread & Circus is Lowering the Price of Natural Food Shopping

WHAT ARE NATURAL FOODS?

There are lots of definitions of the term "natural foods." Ours is pretty simple. As far as we're concerned, natural foods are roast beef and potato chips and ice cream and fish and apples and cheese and beer and cake and practically everything else you've been eating and drinking – and enjoying – all of your life.

But there's one crucial difference between natural foods and, well, the other kind. Natural foods are missing a whole list of questionable ingredients that are all too common in ordinary supermarket fare – additives, hormones, antibodies, preservatives, refined sugars, artificial colors and flavorings and all sorts of other chemicals that don't belong in anything you eat.

At Bread & Circus, natural foods are all we sell.

CHICKEN LEG QUARTERS

Our chicken leg quarters are fresh, tender, juicy, great for everyday eating – and more than 50% off our regular price of 79¢/lb.

Special price: 35¢/lb

Bread & Circus WHOLE WHEAT BREAD

No ordinary commercial bread, Bread & Circus whole wheat is fresh, delectable and baked right in our store, with love and care. No refined sugars. No refined flour and no chemical additives. It's a perfect match for our natural peanut butter and jams. Our everyday price: $1.09 for a 20 oz. loaf.

Special price: 69¢/loaf

WHO SHOULD SHOP AT BREAD & CIRCUS?

If you already eat natural foods, Bread & Circus is the store for you. We offer the greatest variety of natural foods you've ever seen. So once you start shopping here, you won't have to scramble to provide your family with a delicious and varied menu of chemical-free foods.

If you're considering a healthier diet, but you're a little hesitant, Bread & Circus is the store for you, too. We have a full-time information specialist to answer all of your questions, a full-time demonstration center to show you how to incorporate natural foods into your daily menu, recipes by the hundreds – and lots of samples to try before you buy.

Natural SHORT GRAIN BROWN RICE

A major staple, brown rice is an important part of many well-balanced diets. Practically everyone loves its subtle flavor and tender consistency. And remember – brown rice retains its bran and germ layers which contain most of the vitamins and minerals in the grain.

Here's your opportunity to stock up on it at a significant savings. Our everyday low bulk price: 49¢/lb. in bulk.

Special price: 29¢/lb

Fresh Packed TROPICANA ORANGE JUICE

The orange juice that's earned a place on breakfast tables all over America. It's regularly $1.69 per ½ gallon. This week, you can buy it at a remarkable savings.

Special price: $1.19/½ gal

Organically Grown CALIFORNIA TOMATOES

Our tomatoes are organically grown, ripened red on the vine and immediately flown in from the West Coast. We think they're the best available and we display them with pride. Normally, they sell for 89¢/lb.

OUR GUARANTEE

At Bread & Circus we have a unique policy – a guarantee without conditions. That's right, if you don't like whatever you buy at Bread & Circus – for any reason – you can return the unused portion for a full refund. We do our best to offer only the finest food available anywhere and we stand behind what we sell.

GRADE B MAPLE SYRUP

A high-quality dark, full-flavored maple syrup ideal for cooking, for blending with honey or for use as a topping for puddings, pancakes and ice cream. It's perfect for people who like a distinct maple flavor. We normally sell it for $1.15/lb. in bulk.

Special price: 99¢/lb

Mill Creek KERATIN SHAMPOO

This exceptional shampoo not only leaves your hair lustrously clean, it also replaces missing hair protein, helps prevent split ends and helps restore proper pH levels. We usually sell an 18 oz. bottle for $3.25

Special price: $1.59

Uncle Roy's CASHEW DELUXE GRANOLA

Filled with all kinds of delicious and nutritious ingredients, Uncle Roy's is the best-tasting, most popular granola we sell. And it's locally-produced. We think your whole family will love it. Our regular price, $1.39/lb., in bulk.

Special price: 95¢/lb

Bread & Circus VITAMIN C

Like all Bread & Circus vitamins, our vitamin C has a full-disclosure label and it's dated for freshness. And now you can buy this important vitamin for less than a third of its regular price of $3.15 for 100 500 mg. tablets.

Limit: 2 per customer

Special price: 99¢

OUR PHILOSOPHY

At Bread & Circus, natural foods are more than just a way of business. They're also a way of life. That's why we do our best to provide you with the freshest, healthiest, finest natural food available anywhere. And, to make sure our food lives up to its manufacturer's claims and is accurately labeled, our staff experts check our every item. Why? Because we won't sell what we don't believe in. We genuinely care about what you eat.

Mountain High YOGURT

Made without any refined sugars, this honey-sweetened yogurt is available in many delicious flavors. It's great tasting and it's good for you. It's great for snacks and great for breakfast or lunch. We usually sell it at 60¢ an 8 oz. container.

Special price: 3 for $1.29

CLOVER HONEY

It's uncooked and unfiltered and it's one of our most popular and best-tasting honeys – and it's proof that we have everyday low prices, too. Buy it at our bulk liquids section, the only one in town.

Everyday low price: 99¢/lb

OUR PRICE POLICY

We believe natural foods don't have to be expensive – and we intend to prove it. Our pricing policy begins with a search for the best natural food available. Once we find it, we use the purchasing power of the Bread & Circus chain to buy as much as we can at the lowest possible price. Then we pass the savings on to you.

Can you buy food cheaper elsewhere? Yes – but not much cheaper. Can you buy top quality natural food anywhere else at prices lower than we offer every day? Almost impossible. And our specials are even harder to beat.

Poland Spring SPARKLING WATER

Generally acknowledged as one of the best tasting bottled waters. It doesn't contain the dubious chemicals often found in ordinary tap water. This week, we're selling it at a third off its low everyday price of 2 28 oz. bottles for 99¢.

Limit: 6 per customer

Special price: 3 for 99¢

No chemical additives, no refined sugars, no artificial anything... just the best natural food you can buy.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

Politics - they've done it again

Well folks, can you stand one more voice speaking out on the battle over the SGA Attorney General controversy currently being waged on the pages of this newspaper? If you can, I'm certain you'll find some real light being shed on the matter, instead of a volley of slanders and accusations.

As SGA Affirmative Action Officer, one of my responsibilities is to ensure that any searches done for vacant, student positions funded through the Student Activities Trust Fund (SATF) receive thorough advertising, soliciting applications. This applies particularly to areas that are accessible to women and minorities. I was assured by the Chair of this past spring's Attorney General Selection Committee, Liz Hill, then Acting Attorney General, that this was done. Therefore, as far as affirmative action is concerned, I found no violations.

Mary L. Palazzo

What to me appears to be the central point of this whole controversy is this: the main argument I have heard from Co-Presidents Charlene Allen and Tom Ahern for not appointing a permanent Attorney General last spring, is that there were not enough applicants to begin with. There really is no problem with that argument; it is, in fact, a very valid one—for extending an application deadline or starting an entirely new search. However, Tom and Charlene did not bring their concern over the lack of applicants up until after the entire selection process had been completed. Only after the candidates had been interviewed, and only after the selection committee had made its final recommendations for appointment to Attorney General to Tom and Charlene did they state that they did not feel there were enough applicants to begin with, and they intended to conduct another search for the position in the fall, leaving Liz Hill as Acting Attorney General until that time.

"And that's the way it was." As I have consistently maintained throughout this entire controversy and have repeatedly tried to emphasize to both Tom and Charlene that since the Co-Presidents had the sign-up sheet for applications in their office, and were fully aware of the number of applicants they had received for the position when the deadline for applications closed, that if they felt they did not have a large enough applicant pool, the time to stop the selection process or extend the deadline for applications was then, before and further steps in the process had taken place, not after the entire process had been completed.

Technically in a search, the appointing authority—in the case of Attorney General, the Co-Presidents—must select a person to fill a position from the finalists recommended by the search/selection committee. If the appointing authority feels that none of the finalists are truly qualified, they must make a strong case to prove that, in order to refrain from choosing.

No such case exists against Dakin Ferris. He is a Legal Studies major, has worked with LSO, and has been a student senator. The selection committee felt he was fully qualified for the position of Attorney General.

Although I cannot verify all of what Dakin has said in his editorials, the majority of it, to my knowledge, is true. If it is said with anger, I think it is an anger that is both understandable and justified.

Writing this was not an easy decision. I have worked with all the parties involved for nearly a year, and have become friends with all of them. Still, I cannot let my friendship with Tom and Charlene obscure the fact that I believe that, however well intentioned their motives may have been they were very, very wrong not to appoint Dakin Ferris to the office of Attorney General this past spring.

Hopefully, my perspective will assist the student body in making up their own minds about this controversy, and it is my hope they will take the time to express their opinion, be it on the pages of this newspaper or to their Senators or to the Co-Presidents themselves.

Mary L. Palazzo is the SGA Affirmative Action Officer

Does the SGA need new ideas?

The present situation in the SGA Senate is intolerable. The level of almost childish bickering and rhetoric has reduced two very important issues into to two mutually exclusive opposites; that of local issues versus that of national and international issues. This has created an ugly wall which deteriorates lines of communication, and undermines progress.

Josh Meyer

The Collegian has received a large volume of letters either supporting or condemning the SGA veto of a Grenada statement, as we have anytime the SGA does anything. When are people going to realize that BOTH are necessary, that by refusing to address issues of national and international importance, the Senate would be guilty of neglect as representatives of the citizenry of the US. Representative democracy is based on the active participation of all sectors of the society, not just on the legislature of the government.

The student government of one university may not be able to influence federal policy, but by making a stand for what they feel is just (as a representative body), they can contribute to a larger voice that is heard by the government we elect. National outcry has saved us from inept government too many times to neglect it.

If the SGA has not effectively addressed local issues such as housing, educational services, etc., why not look into the causes and effects of these failures and neglects instead of condemning other Senators for debating the "wrong" things like national and domestic affairs?

Why not do something positive like suggest the formation of a National Affairs committee within the Senate to facilitate discussion and formulation of a consensus opinion before an issue comes up on the Senate floor? If the Senate can do this for Academic Affairs and Public Policy, than why not do it for the other issues that they waste their time arguing over on the Senate floor?

A committee such as this could help educate a largely uninformed Senate body on issues such as Grenada so decisions can be made on a rational level, not an emotional one. It isn't as simple as "US out of ••••••••."(Add any third world country that happens to be at war.) The Senate spends more time debating about whether or not to discuss issues like Grenada than it does debating the actual issue. Why not do the research and education in a committee where concerned members of the Senate can draft an amendment, and get the bickering out of the way? Save the Senate floor for voting, and brief discussion of other amendments from the committees.

It is true that the Senate should spend more time on local issues, or at least more time implementing programs that they have recognized to be in the students' interest. Maybe if they stop bashing their heads against this imaginary wall, they will succeed.

Josh Meyer is the Collegian Editorial page Editor

Letters

Let's cut the crap, and work

The Student Government Association is here for one purpose: to serve the needs of the students we represent. Of late, it seems that many of us seem to be intent on harassing each other into an excited state of frenzy. The result of this is that our effectiveness as a governing body is diminished to the detriment of the students. So, let's cut the crap and get back to work.

Dissent is a student issue

To the Editor,

Lately, there has been quite a bit of debate over what is and what is not a student issue. Most of this debate stems from the recent consideration of a motion during a Student [illegible] tervention in Grenada. Is this an issue that students should be concerned with? I would contend it is a very, very important student issue.

The invasion of Grenada is a student issue. Many voted against the resolution (or didn't vote at all) because they felt that this is not something with which the Senate should concern itself. This attitude is a mistake.

The issue is student lives. This country has troops in both Grenada and Lebanon right now, and it is possible that we will be in Nicaragua soon. The possibility of a war and a draft is close at hand, and that is a real issue for at least 50 percent of the population of this campus. One former UMass student has already been killed in Lebanon. Many more could follow.

We are all over 18, and citizens of this country. To that extent, we have both a right and a responsibility to make our voices heard. The fact that students have not done so in the recent past can be directly connected to our lack of political clout on national, state, local, and campus levels (The U.S. is one of the few countries where this state of affairs exists). We must not allow the myth of the "apathetic student" to live on.

Students were a major force in ending the Vietnam war. If we are to have a say in whether students once again fight in someone else's land, we have to mobilize ourselves in the same way--campus by campus. No one else is going to do it for us.

Students have already said that this issue is important. 500 to 1000 students, our constituents, attended rallies concerning the invasion. This reflects a strong feeling on this campus. As their representatives, we have a responsibility to at least take a stand.

Less than 50 percent of the Senate decided this issue last week. The roll-call indicates that 45 percent of the body was absent, and 9 percent abstained from the vote. By allowing the issue to be decided by a minority of the Senate, we have failed to meet our responsibility to take a clear stand.

Students are citizens of this country. Therefore, they should participate in its decision-making process. I for one am going to, and I invite all of you as students to attend tonights Senate meeting, in CC room 163 at 7 p.m.

Tom Ahern
Campus President, SGA

. . . and more on the SGA

To the Editor,

This is a response to the article on Nov. 3, Grenada Motion Causes SGA walkout. I found myself laughing uncontrollably in the Campus Center Reading room by the fifth paragraph of the article, not at the reporter's humor, but at the incredibly ridiculous situation the poor woman was unfortunate enough to report on.

Apparently, the two student presidents were upset with the fact that a resolution condemning the U.S. invasion of Grenada was defeated during the meeting. So severe was their outrage and disappointment, their course of action was to walkout of the senate government meeting over which they preside as presidents. It is obvious that this response is based on pure, unadulterated immaturity, for the co-president's walkout implies the fact that they cannot cope with differing political opinions with their own. The co-president's action was in itself oppressive. For by vacating the meeting the presidents refused to respect the fact that a dissenting opinion existed, and in essence, oppressed this opinion by using their presidential powers in an abusive way. They dramatically defined the term "Sore Losers" and disrespected the democratic process upon which this country is based.

George McKenzie, a Third World Caucus senator and supporter of the resolution, went so far as to resign his position after the defeat of the resolution; for the following reason: "There is no way I can continue to participate with a body of students who can go along with the government and say it's all right to invade."

If Mr. McKenzie feels he cannot participate with a body of students whose opinions differ from his, he should not have pursued the controversial position of senator. To resign his position due to conflicting opinions is a cowardly, narrow-minded action.

The Student senate is not a means for its presidents to coerce public opinion by abusing their political clout, but a representative democratic assembly which recognizes and respects student opinion and rights. The SGA presidents ignored this fact last Wednesday and unfortunately will probably do so again in the next meeting, for a similar motion is already in the process of being planned.

Grenadians set stage for invasion

By NORMAN HILL
Special to Black Affairs

Black Americans have reacted with concern to the recent invasion of Grenada. Clearly, black Americans have a particular interest in political developments in that tiny island country with a population of some 110,000 blacks.

Indeed blacks and all Americans are concerned with the question of whether the invasion was at all justified. Amid much confusion surrounding Grenada, it would be worthwhile to examine the recent history of that troubled island before drawing any firm conclusions about the advisability of the U.S. response.

In the 1970s Grenada was ruled by one Sir Eric Gairy, a politician attracted to the study of UFOs, the occult, and extra-terrestrials. Sir Eric's rule was characterized by corruption and intimidation of the political opposition by means of a private pro-government band of criminals known as the "Mongoose Gang." Yet a political opposition was permitted to function, trade unions had some degree of independence, and the judiciary was independent of the state.

Nonetheless, popular discontent with his administration led to a growth in the popularity of Maurice Bishop and the New Jewel Movement (its name stands for Joint Endeavor for Welfare, Education and Liberation) he led. In 1979, Bishop replaced Sir Eric in an armed takeover.

In short, Maurice Bishop differed in one important respect from Sir Eric Gairy - he was a more ruthless and able tyrant. The people of Grenada were subjected to four years of intensive "revolutionary" indoctrination. Their tiny island was transformed virtually overnight into an island fortress complete with the East Caribbean's best equipped army and hundreds of Cuban, East German, Bulgarian and Soviet advisers.

The Grenada under Maurice Bishop, further aroused the concern of its neighbors by building, with massive Cuban Assistance, a new airport which had the capability of serving as a base for Soviet-bloc bombers.

Thus, when in a mid-October military coup, the Bishop regime was overthrown and Bishop murdered together with other government leaders, there no longer was any semblance of government on Grenada.

It was in this context the the black-led East Caribbean nations appealed to the U.S. to lead a multi-national invasion of the island in the interest of stability and democracy.

Small pockets of primarily Cuban resistance remain on the island today. But the military action on the part of the U.S., Jamaica, Barbados, and other East Caribbean nations appears to have succeeded in wresting control of the island from the Cuban-backed killers in the Grenadian military junta. Not surprisingly, the black population of the island has welcomed the American and Caribbean forces as liberators and not as invaders.

The Grenadian people are probably the ones who are most surprised at the great outcry on the part of many world leaders.

Clearly any committment of American forces is a grave one, particularly when it leads to the loss of lives.

Moreover, there may be some justification to the view that the invasion of Grenada violates some tenets of international laws. The preponderance of evidence suggests that there was sufficient justification for the action taken by the United States at the urging of a number of Caribbean democracies.

Of course, what matters most now is the holding of open elections in which the people of Grenada will be able freely to select a new government which represents their desires and interests. Only such a result will justify the military action taken by the United States and its Caribbean allies.

Only such a result will bring with it the applause and support of blacks, and all Americans dedicated to the cause of democracy at home and abroad. Only such a result will signify that those who lost their lives in Grenada have not died in vain.

Black activist jailed by American 'justice' system

By DR. MANNING MARABLE
Special to Black Affairs

Today a black man, Frank "Parky" Grace, is locked up in a federal penitentiary in Memphis Tennessee. For almost a decade he has been imprisoned for a crime he did not commit. His only offense was his unyielding commitment to Black political rights and equality. Grace's ordeal is a testament to the systemic racism of the American criminal justice system.

Fifteen years ago, Grace was a well-known and respected Black activist in New Bedford, Massachusetts. After his discharge from the U.S. Army in December, 1968, he quickly became involved in a series of peace-oriented, human rights and Black Power organizations. New Bedford police arrested him at least 14 times in a four year period, on a variety of absurd and unsubstantiated charges: "Conspiracy to commit anarchy," "conspriacy to overthrow the government," "public drunkeness," and "conspiracy to commit murder."

Grace was one of the victims of the FBI's Counter-Intelligence Program (COINTELPRO) which arrested, harrassed and executed political dissidents. Grace's free shoe and clothing program for the city's poor, and a breakfast program for children were viewed as dangerous and subversive. But the authorities still had no evidence to put him behind bars permanently. On August 8, 1972, Marvin Morgan of Providence, Rhode Island, and two other Black men came to New Bedford to purchase drugs. Getting into a scuffle with some local men, Morgan was shot and later died. Ross Grace, Parky's brother, committed the shooting; Parky Grace was on the other side of town that night, and learned of the incident a half-hour later. Grace was arrested, handcuffed, and was viciously beaten on the way to the station headquarters. Taken to a backroom, he was froced to walk through a gauntlet of officers, who pounded him with fists and clubs. When Grace finally resisted, he was electric shocked, blackjacked, and clubbed to the floor. His legs were pulled apart and he was repeatedly kicked in the groin; his hands were bloodied and even bitten. The brutal beating left Grace with permanent eye damage, permanent back and side spams, chipped teeth scars, bloody urine and testicle pain.

But the forces of "justice" left nothing to chance. Grace's supporters at Boston's Community Organization Toward a New Survival (C.O.N.S.) have evidence which indicates the bizarre "railroad" of Parky Grace.

Ross Grace, the man who pulled the trigger, was given life with the possibility of parole in 15 years. Parky Grace, who was innocent, received "Natural Life Imprisonment" - absolutely no parole.

Despite the beatings, the torture, and the injustice of his imprisonment, Parky Grace retains his humanity - a commitment to struggle. His ordeal is, in no way small, the political battle for justice for all the oppressed.

Neighborhoods grow up

The Neighborhoods
Saturday, Nov. 5
Hangar One

By JIM FEIN
Collegian Staff

The snow had been advertised as a "new music dance party," and that, it turns out, was a most fitting description. Two of the heavyweights of the Boston and NYC rock-new wave scenes, the Neighborhoods and the Certain Generals, came to town last Saturday night to make it all possible for the large, enthusiastic crowd in attendence.

The Neighborhoods, for the unfamiliar, are and have been one of the best unsigned bands in Boston for four years now. They first rose to prominence in the summer of 1979, when they won Boston's first annual Rock and Roll Rumble. Now, some four years and two bass players later, the Hoods are a changed, more mature band.

The Neighborhoods are, and always have been, a threesome. Original members David Minehan (guitar, lead vocals) and Mike Quaglia (drums) were joined by bassist Lee Harrington about a year ago to form the current line-up. The Hoods, often characterized by the brisk, breakneck pace of their music, still play at the same speed. The difference, however, is in more mature, thought provoking, and elaborate lyrics.

The Neighborhoods played songs from both their early days ("Think it Over," "She's so Good," and "Arrogance") and more recent times ("Rhyme, Rhyme," "The Witness," and "Innocence Lost"). About five songs into the show (all of which were played at a breakneck pace), the densely packed dance floor slowly began to clear as some in the dancing crowd began to tire. Now, it seemed, would be the ideal time for a change of pace. The Hoods responded appropriately, and much to my surprise, with an old song, the slower paced "Mr. Reeves." At the show's end the Hoods were wooed back to the stage for obligatory encores, one of which was a cover of the Buzzcock's "Ever Fallen in Love."

What does the future hold in store for the Neighborhoods, who were once described by a Trouser Press reviewer as "the best extant band in America today"? Only uncertainty. They have been one of the top local bands in New England over the past four years, playing throughout the region, NYC, and as far South as Washington D.C. They have successfully established both their name and a following. Yet they are limited by one factor, a lack of vinyl for the potential listener.

In the four years they've existed, they've released only one record (a single). That was "Prettiest Girl" b/w "No Place Like Home," which garnered heavy (local) airplay after it was first released, but is now somewhat dated. When reached for comment about a future release, the band replied that an LP they recorded some two and a half years ago (produced by Rick Harte), that wasn't released due to legal implications, may now actually be released. How soon though, is as yet, unclear.

In the meantime, the only real exposure to the Neighborhood's music will be through their live show, which, on Saturday night, was most enjoyable.

Dave Minehan of the Neighborhoods who performed Saturday night at Hangar One

Opening for the Neighborhoods were the Certain Generals, a NYC outfit, and (as was advertised) "the top unrecorded band" in that city. The band is a foursome consisting of a bassist, a guitarist, a drummer (a woman who was quite good) and a lead vocalist. Their music is best described as experimental rock, of varied tempos, with lead vocals delivered in an intense, yet introverted manner. They began in a mediocre fashion, but the final few songs of their set were very good, and persuaded some to the dance floor.

Now if only these two bands would release records...

ROOM CHOOSING PROCESS FOR SPRING 1984

Please read carefully

Reserving your Current Room Assignment

If you intend to keep your present dormitory assignment, personally sign up with your Resident Director/Residence Hall Manager on Monday, November 14. DEADLINE FOR ROOM RESERVATION IS MONDAY, NOVEMBER 14.

If you want to keep your present dormitory assignment while also submitting a preference form you must do the following:

1. Sign up for a room in your dorm on either Monday, November 14 or Tuesday, November 15.
2. Fill out a Preference Form. On the Preference Form in the lower right corner is a box you must "check" if you wish to be returned to your dorm if your dorm or area choices cannot be met.

YOUR OLD DORMITORY ASSIGNMENT IS GUARANTEED ONLY IF YOU DO BOTH STEPS.

Changing your Room Assignment

If you wish to move to another room in the same dormitory, you must sign up with your Resident Director/Residence Hall Manager. Deadline for moving within a dormitory is Tuesday, November 15.

If you wish to move to another dormitory, you must complete a Housing Preference Form. Deadline for returning completed Housing Preference Forms to the Housing Assignment Office is Wednesday, November 23. Preference Forms may be dropped off at any Area Operations Office (Southwest-JFK Lobby, Northeast/Sylvan-Johnson, Central/Orchard Hill-101 Baker).

Roommate Requests

If you wish to move to another dormitory to room with a student already assigned to that dormitory, you must together complete a Roommate Request Form. Deadline for returning Roommate Request Forms to the Housing Assignment Office is Wednesday, November 16.

If you wish to become roommates with a student in a dormitory to which neither of you is currently assigned, you must each complete a Housing Preference Form. These forms should be identical (with the exception of the "check" box) and stapled together. Deadline for returning Housing Preference Forms is Wednesday, November 23.

In-House Room Request Forms

If, during the regular In-House Room Choosing period, you were unable to secure a particular type of accomodation (a particular single or double room), please contact your Resident Director/Residence Hall Manager and fill out an In-House Room Request Form. Rooms that become available during Intersession will be assigned according to seniority, to those students who have filled out this form and returned it to their Resident Director/Residence Hall Manager.

Questions?

If you still have questions about the Room-Choosing process, please contact your House Staff or the Housing Assignment Office (545-2100), 235 Whitmore. Thank you.

Tough luck continues, Harvard tops UMass

By MIKE LEVINE
Collegian Staff

It doesn't take a college education to write about a loss by your school's soccer team. But after ten losses, even Ernest Hemingway would have a hard time coming up with an original way to write about loss number eleven. So rather than try to tiptoe around the issue, let's just get down to business.

The University of Massachusetts men's soccer team lost their eleventh game in eighteen outings Tuesday afternoon at Boyden--this time to Harvard University, 2-0.

Things didn't start too well for the Minutemen. Just 33 seconds into the game, Crimson midfielder Glen Brack threaded the needle with a pass to John Catliff, who fired the ball past goalkeeper Mark Noble, who was playing his first game in net since being called up from the JV team earlier in the week, to give Harvard a quick 1-0 lead.

Later in the first half, the Crimson came close to adding another goal when Lane Kenworthy broke in all alone on Noble, but the freshman goalie made an excellent save to keep the score at 1-0 at halftime.

Early in the second half, the Minutemen put on a brief flurry that saw a John Brigham shot stopped by goalie Matt Ginsberg, and a Kevin Flynn shot go just over the crossbar.

Shortly after that, Harvard scored its second goal when midfielder Jay Hooper took a pass from Catliff, outran the defense, then put the ball inside the right post.

That second goal was typical of the style of play, as the Crimson outran and outhustled the Minutemen throughout most of the game.

UMass will have one last chance to break out of their season-long scoring slump (just eight goals in 19 games) when they take on Hartwick College this Saturday afternoon at 2 p.m. at Boyden Field. UMass starts at 3-11-4.

Spikers host Sfld tonight

By ED CUNNINGHAM
Collegian Staff

Tonight, NOPE gym will be the site for some exciting division II volleyball. The two teams squaring off against each other will be the fourth ranked, in the Northeast, University of Massachusetts and second ranked Springfield College.

UMass last faced Springfield on September 24th at the Central Connecticut Tournament. In that two out of three contest, UMass took game one, but lost the ensuing games 15-9,15-12.

Tonight's 7 p.m. match is a three out of five series. UMass will be looking to avenge that early season loss. "That was a long time ago, we've improved a great deal since then," commented UMass assistant coach Sara Bonthuis.

The 32-15 spikers are coming into this match following a second place finish in the state tournament behind undefeated Massachusetts Institute of Technology. According to Bonthuis, the team was 'disappointed' with their second place finish.

"They know they have to pull themselves up by the bootstraps. It should be a very even match, the kids are up for it," commented Bonthuis.

UMass has only one more match (against Northeastern University) following the Springfield contest. Following that match, the spikers will hopefully participate in the ECAC tournament. Hopefully must be stressed, because only the top four teams in the northeast are invited to play in the post season tournament.

These circumstances should lead to some thrilling action at NOPE. It is a 'must' win situation for both teams. Only one will prevail.

Women's bowling optimistic

By STEPHANIE SCHMALL
Collegian Correspondent

Beneath the ever-so-popular sports here at the University of Massachusetts lurks the women's bowling team.

The team, which has a record of 2-0 at the moment, is a very competitive club. The squad had a very impressive season last year and it ended at the hands of West Texas State at the Nationals in St. Louis.

This season, the team is eager to go for it all once again. With their two victories in October, UMass is in second place in the eight team Tri-State College Bowling Conference. The bowlers next match is against the University of Lowell, who is in first place and UMass' top rival.

"We want to beat them this time," said captain Kelli MacDonald. "We have a strong line-up and we're consistent."

The Minutewomen have seven veterans on the team and one rookie and the team averages an impressive 155. Their strength lies with MacDonald and Pat Weygand who average 180 and 162, respectively. As a powerful doubles team, the duo came in first in both of their matches this season.

Close behind and contributing are Tina Hoyt (150 average) and Karen Mayers (148). Liz Grossman (146) and Amy Freedman (142) finish out the starting six.

Interestingly enough, the team has done well without a coach and with a problem that plagues all club sports - a lack of money. The squad does get money on a match basis through the intramural department despite their tight budget. But it is often not enough for the team to travel to as many national tournaments as they would like to.

As a whole though, the UMass women's bowling team is looking very well and they are confident in themselves.

A good challenge doesn't bother Stacey Flionis

INTENSE--Stacey Flionis (5) competes for the ball against Springfield. The sure-footed senior doesn't lose the ball too often.

By ELLEN RICHARD
Collegian Staff

Nothing seems like too big of a challenge for Stacey Flionis. While she was growing up, if her big brother did something, she could do it, too. Besides stacking up accomplishments on her soccer team in high school, Flionis ran track, played softball and was a center for a girl's ice hockey team which won the Conference championship two years.

For Flionis, playing sports was mainly a way to keep up with big brother. But, lucky for the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team, she liked playing sports, especially soccer, and stuck with it.

"I grew up always playing with my brothers and my brothers' friends," the senior tri-captain said. "We played softball, street hockey, basketball and football. It seemed I was always a little bit slower. He was older and better. I thought I was tough. I'd hang out with the boys and play in casual competition."

That toughness and enthusiasm followed Flionis into college as she was one of two women who played on a men's soccer team for three summers while in Amherst.

"It was rough but it was definitely a challenge," Flionis said about the experience. "And we did really well because they wouldn't have kept us on the team."

With the playoffs right around the corner for UMass (Sunday at 1 p.m.), Flionis and the team face yet another challenge. With 11 people on the field all season, there has been only four relief people on the bench. At one time, two players were injured and two were playing while ill forcing most of the 11 players to play the entire game without a break. But this has not affected the Minutewomen negatively. In fact, it has done just the opposite.

"I don't think it's hard, I think it's better," Flionis said about the small, but winning, team. "As far as the team goes, it brought everyone closer. There's team unity and team spirit because no one can afford to take a break. In that way I think that's why we've been doing so well."

For Flionis, who initially did not want to go to UMass, this year's team is the definition of what a winning team should be.

"I feel like this year, right now, is the kind of team I've dreamed of playing on," she said. "It's that intense and close. You know there's 11 people on the field to give 110 percent. This year I'm glad I had the chance to experience this." Although she said she has loved playing on the soccer team, this season's squad was somehow different and special.

"I feel like I was here three years too early. I'd like to be a freshman this year," she said wishfully.

"I can't say enough about the team. It's different than any team I've been on. It's the chemistry between everyone. You can feel it on the field."

The senior halfback, who was a Globe All-Scholastic for 2 years in high school, has been leading the team in scoring since mid October when she recorded a hat trick at Dartmouth. With eight goals and 18 points, Banda calls Flionis the best-skilled player on the team.

She said she acquired her talent from a lot of watching and playing, and from Banda. Being quick on her feet and being able to outrun her opponents is an asset. The only problem she has encountered is with wearing glasses during the games. Whether she weats them or not, she still runs into problems because she cannot wear contacts.

"The only problem I have without my glasses is misjudging a high ball coming down."

Born in Marlboro and an English major at UMass, Flionis plans on going to graduate school and becoming a soccer assistant with a team, possibly in New York. When she receives her Masters degree she said she would like to work for an athletic company. She does have one dream that still simmers in the back of her mind.

"I've always wanted to manage an NASL team (North American Soccer League) if it's still around by the time I get out of Graduate school. I used to think I'd want to coach a team as I grew older. But I figured I'd go all the way and own one. It's just a dream when I'm older and rich and successful, that would be one of the things I'd like to do."

Nothing seems like too big of a challenge for Stacey Flionis.

Campus still troubled by suspicious dorm blazes

By MARY ANNE BEEN
and PAUL BASKEN
Collegian Staff

The sixth suspicious fire within a week in a University of Massachusetts dormitory, less than one month following a series of unsolved fires in another residence hall, is causing fear and heightened security in the building.

The latest fire under investigation by police was discovered Tuesday night in Cashin Dormitory in Sylvan Residential Area after a paper bag stuffed with paper was placed in a fire extinguisher cabinet and lit. Although students were able to put out the fire before firefighters arrived, residents were evacuated from the eight-story building.

Another fire of unknown origin was reported early Tuesday morning in Dwight Dormitory in Northeast Residential Area. The Dwight fire, which University police said was thought to be unrelated to the Cashin fires, was caused by someone torching a bulletin board on the third floor.

Although all six fires in Cashin have occurred on the building's second floor, including one inside the lounge of one of the building's eight-resident suites, Rosemary Tarentino of the Hampshire County District Attorney's office said "It is difficult to tell" if the fires have all been set by the same person.

"It's getting pretty scary," said Deborah Bonner, 20, a junior pre-COINS major from Hudson. Bonner lives in a suite next door to one in which a trash can fire was discovered early Sunday morning. But 24-hour security has now been instituted in the dorm and, Bonner said, "No one leaves their doors open any more."

However, despite the extra efforts of housing officials to stress fire rules and safety, the rash of small fires is causing some students to become complacent.

"We are working to make sure that everybody takes it very seriously," said Ellen Wolf of the Student Affairs Office, who noted that five of the six fires, as well as the one in Dwight, were put out by students without an alarm being pulled. Wolf said she was told by one Cashin resident's parent that "my daughter seems to be taking this very lightly, but I don't."

According to police, students failed to pull the alarm in the Dwight fire even though at one point the smoke was described as so thick students opened several windows to clear it. The fire in Dwight, the six this past week in Cashin, and the seven fires last month in Crampton Dormitory in the Southwest Residential College are all under investigation, police said. The Tuesday fire in Cashin caused an estimated $25 in damage, police said.

University officials testify against UMass attorney

By ANNE McCRORY
Collegian Staff

SPRINGFIELD—The vice chancellor for Student Affairs at the University of Massachusetts testified yesterday the sole reason he did not appoint Michael Pill to a professional position at the Legal Services Office (LSO) was because he was not a member of the Massachusetts Bar.

Pill's suit claims defendants Dennis Madson, then Acting Associate Vice Chancellor Larry Benedict and Staff Assistant Bryan Harvey "intentionally and maliciously obstructed (his) appointment" to the Student Government Association (SGA) counsel position.

Madson, who alone held the signatory power to appoint staff at the time in question, said he did not sign Pill's personnel action form because he "was concerned (whether Pill) could meet, with his qualities, the duties outlined in the job description."

That description required Pill be a member of "the bar," a qualification Madson said had been changed from "member of the Massachusetts Bar Association" for the first time during the same 1979 search that hired attorneys Charles DiMare and Mark Eckstein but forced Pill to seek "temporary consultant" status.

Madson said he was not sure what the phrase "the bar" meant, and sought counsel from University lawyer Sid Myer.

"Based on counsel's advice, I did not appoint him," Madson said, citing a memoradum dated Oct. 16, 1979 which may be submitted as evidence if Myer is called as a witness.

Under cross examination from his own attorney, Madson denied there was any other reason, stated or otherwise, that caused him to deny Pill the position.

Madson said he "knew something of his (Pill's) reputation against administration processes" before Pill began seeking professional LSO employment, but that such views were "not unusual" and "like (those of) hundreds of staff" at the University.

Harvey, whom Pill had criticized in a Collegian editorial in 1977 and later reportedly called "an administrative spy," said he told Madson that Pill was "argumentative," "did not settle issues amicably," and "was not effective as an advocate," having lost a lawsuit against the University.

Harvey, a former member of the SGA Senate, said he "happened to know" through his affiliation with that body that "Pill was not a member of the Massachusetts Bar, but had practiced through admission of some special rule that had expired." This knowledge drew Pill's documents to his attention, and advice from University counsel was sought to see if bar membership was "proper," Harvey said.

Harvey said any dissent between himself and Pill concerned a "few internal organizational things in student government."

Benedict testified he recalled two bar mentions on Pill's resume, which he reviewed before passing it on to Madson.

The $250,000 lawsuit also claims the defendants "repeatedly interfered with (Pill's) hiring and employment" for the positions of director of Student Activities in 1979 and Associate Dean of Students in summer 1981. Witnesses testified yesterday Pill's resume for associate dean was submitted during social after-hours on the application deadline and was stashed in Madson's pocket. When its absence was noted, Pill was scheduled an interview, though he did not get the job.

SGA kills Grenada motion, okays new attorney general

By LISA-MARIE CANTWELL
Collegian Staff

A resolution condemning the U.S. invasion of Grenada was defeated last night for a second time by the Undergraduate Student Senate, and a permanent student Attorney General was approved.

The Grenada resolution was defeated with 40 senators opposing, 36 supporting, and 3 abstentions.

"This is an important issue, but it is not an appropriate issue for this forum," said Orchard Hill area senator Timothy Rudolph.

Bill Collins, a Southwest area senator, expressed similar sentiment during the debate period. "I am angry," Collins, who opposed the resolution, said. "I believe the invasion of Grenada was a positive thing. I have a right to say that, but I don't feel I have a right to impose this on the senate body," Collins said.

"This is a student issue," Third World Caucus senator Robert Teixeira said, and mentioned that 500 to 700 students marched in protest of the invasion on October 27.

"We as a student body have a right to express our opinion," he said.

Student Government Association co-President Tom Ahern vetoed the original defeat of the resolution, a presidential power which has not been exercised in two years, on the grounds that there were 10 abstensions at last week's vote.

Ahern said the abstensions showed him that some senators "feel it is not an important issue," and that this is an important issue to consider and vote on.

Senator Ken Levinson said he abstained because he felt many people including himself "did not know the facts."

The senate unanimously approved Ahern's appointment of Susan Glachrin as permanent attorney general. Glachrin is the first permanent appointment to that office since Lisa Ziebel, who served from 1981 to 1982. Three acting attorney generals have served since then.

The appointment of a permanent attorney general means the "civil rights of students on campus will be better secured," Dave McCarthy, president of Southwest area government, said.

Glachrin was ranked second of the two candidates presented to Ahern by the attorney general selection committee. Some senators expressed reservations at this, but Ahern explained that "one person was ranked better at doing the job, but both were ranked able to do the job."

The senate later passed a motion which commended the UMass Board of Trustees for "sensibly and justly postponing the proposed tuition increase until more research, time, and energy can be given to the issue of overcrowding in high demand classes."

The Senate also applauded SGA co-President Charlene Allen's announcement that loans from friends have allowed her to stay on in her position.

Palestinians shell PLO stronghold

TRIPOLI, Lebanon (AP) — Palestinian rebels backed by Syria rained hundreds of shells on PLO chairman Yasser Arafat's last Middle East bastion Wednesday, but an Arafat spokesman said a truce was arranged later in the day.

"We pray this is serious but we are very skeptical" the truce will hold. said the spokesman, who asked not to be identified.

Wednesday's withering barrage cornered Arafat in this northern port city. His spokesman said shelling diminished "significantly" after the truce agreement, but Arafat strongholds in the Baddawi refugee camp and Tripoli still were being hit.

Reagan discusses trade in Japan

TOKYO (AP) — President Reagan, welcomed by Emperor Hirohito and flag-waving school children, cautioned his hosts Wednesday that failure to settle trade disputes between the United States and Japan could damage their political relations.

Uniformed sentries, part of a 90,000-member security force deployed for Reagan's protection, stood guard on downtown streets and atop buildings as the president arrived for three days of critical talks with Japanese officials on trade, defense, energy and finance issues.

After a formal welcoming ceremony under gray skies in the courtyard of the ornate Akasaka Palace, Reagan toured the Imperial Palace with the 82-year-old Hirohito and held the first of two business meetings with Prime Minister Yasuhiro Nakasone.

Bar member pleads to be kept on

TALLAHASSEE, Fla (AP) — An elderly black lawyer who once waged a one-man fight against segregation in Florida's university system made an impassioned plea Wednesday to remain a member of the Florida Bar.

Virgil Hawkins of Leesburg told the Florida Supreme Court he will be 77 on Nov. 28 and that his "hour glass" is running out of sand. He said he wanted to leave as a bar member, a goal he had fought for nearly 30 years to achieve.

DC-10s don't scare passengers away

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. (AP) — The 1979 crash of a DC-10 that killed all 272 passengers and three other crashes involving the jetliners failed to deter passengers from flying on them, a study released Wednesday concludes.

"There was no evidence that people were staying off the DC-10 six to 10 months after the crash," said the report by Arnold I. Barnett of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology's Sloan School of Management and Anthony J. Lofaso of Hofstra University.

"It was not that we found limited evidence of DC-10 avoidance but could not call it statistically significant; rather we found virtually no indication that such avoidance occurred at all."

AROUND THE REGION

Money for tunnel may be okayed

WASHINGTON (AP) - Prospects are good Congress will pass acid rain control legislation and approve money for a major Boston highway project, Massachusetts Gov. Michael S. Dukakis and Sen. Edward J. Kennedy said Wednesday.

Dukakis and Kennedy, D-Mass., made their observations after emerging from a private meeting with Sen. Robert T. Stafford, R-Vt., chairman of the committee that has jurisdiction over both issues.

Dukakis said Stafford, chairman of the Environment and Public Works Committee, was sympathetic to the state's plans to build a third tunnel under Boston Harbor to accomodate traffic to and from Logan Airport.

That $2 billion plan also calls for depressing the now-elevated Central Artery, the expressway through downtown Boston.

"It solves a very serious transportation problem for Boston and New England," Dukakis said.

He said Transportation Secretary Elizabeth Dole, who wrote Stafford last week criticizing the number of highway projects the House had added to what was supposed to have been an emergency road bill, was wrong in singling out Massachusetts.

Flynn is ahead of King in mayoral competition

BOSTON (AP) - A city councilor who was once a strident opponent of busing for desegregation appears to be widening his lead over a black activist as the battle to succeed retiring Mayor Kevin White heads into its final days.

Raymond L. Flynn, capitalizing on strong labor support and his solid Irish-American base in South Boston, has led by more that 10 percentage points in recent polls against Melvin H. King, a former legislator who is the first black to make the city's mayoral runoff.

They were on opposite sides of the violent busing battles which tore Boston apart in the mid-1970s and left deep racial scars. However, both men have avoided racial attacks during the campaign and have stressed many fo the same issues.

Pure water chosen over tots' teeth

BOSTON (AP) — Children living in Springfield, Chicopee and Agawam face higher dental bills due to the decision of local voters to reject proposals to add fluoride to public water supplies, the state's dental chief said Wednesday.

But leaders of the anti-fluoride movement said they hoped the 2-to-1 vote in the communities Tuesday against the tooth decay preventative will end debate on the issue.

"We hope this clarifies once and for all what the public is saying and that is: Leave our water alone," Stephen Dean, president of the Massachusetts Communities for the Purity of Water, said after the vote.

Crying babies harm moms' hearing

BOSTON (AP) — A mother cradling a howling infant in her arms is subjected to almost as much noise as somebody standing three feet from a jackhammer, a doctor says.

Dr. Bruce Bostrom said the measurements were made when a young mother complained of temporary deafness after an outburst of screaming by her 11-month-old infant.

Money may bring about centralized animal labs

By TAMI BORTON
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts may see centralized laboratory animal facilities if a $2.5 to 3 million capital outlay put forth by the Animal Care Committee here is approved by the state legislature.

The request for money from the UMass fiscal year 1985 budget came about as a result of the committee's engineering study, which followed United States Department of Agriculture charges of animal care standards violations on campus, Committee Head R. Glen Brown said.

USDA charges, made in August 1983, claim that in some departments on campus, animals' food supplies were improperly stored, feeders were unsanitary, cages were too small or unsanitary and some buildings needed new floors, walls or ventilation systems.

The department the University are engaged in an attempt to settly the matter, "but we're still discussing it, and it will be a short while before we'll know the outcome," Senior Compliance Officer for USDA Frank Germaine said.

The centralized facilities will solve some of the problems UMass was charged with and it will organize animal care procedures, Brown, the Food Science Department head, said.

"Presently staff is scattered across campus. The center will enable us to attract a high-caliber technician," he said, "and (the center) will solve organizational problems," thus improving the quality of care, he said.

Since the cost of upgrading already existing facilities is approximately the same as the proposed project, the committee and supporting administrators are pushing for the new centralized laboratories, Brown said.

University Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey, who has the final say in policy decisions on campus, is in favor of the proposal, but other priorities may cut into the outlay, Brown said.

USDA standards have changed since the facilities in question were built. In fact, "standards were not well defined at that point," he said. "But if the University had a good ongoing maintenence program, rather than deference, we would have an upgraded system now."

Workshop addresses rape awareness and prevention

By MICHELLE HYDE
Collegian Staff

By the time a rapist is convicted, he or she will have committed roughly 40 rapes, according to Linda Piorun of the University of Massachusetts Police Department.

Piorun spoke last night at a Rape Awareness Workshop in Brown House, sponsored by UMass police, Health Services and the Everywoman's Center. The women addressed the subject of rape, its prevention, and the counseling of a rape victim.

Rape is any sexual act engaged in against the will of the victim by threat of bocily harm, she said.

"The most important thing to remember is that you don't have to say no," she said. "Your fear will be exhibited. The rapist will know."

Jo Ellen Franklin, an Educator-Advocate at the Everywoman's Center said rape evolves out of a societal myth that men are agressive while women are passive.

"From this thinking a myth evolves that women really want to be controlled, that women secretly want to be raped," she said.

Piorum said there is a "real obvious way to encourage a rapist" when one is walking alone: looking vulnerable or lost, hitchiking, taking the shortcut through the woods instead of walking down a well-lit street.

Franklin said in order to prevent rape when walking home, have an "awareness of everything going on around you:" who is walking behing you, who lives nearby should you be confronted or attacked.

"Learn how to say 'no' and mean it," said Karen Larson of the Health Services. "Women are taught to be nice, not to cause scenes," but a rape could be a life or death situation, she said.

If a person is raped, there are three alternatives for help on campus: the police, the Health Center, and the Educator-Advocate-Rape Crisis Hotline at the Everywoman's Center, Franklin said.

The first thing a person should do to help a rape victim, Franklin said, is to "attempt to give that person a sense of control, let them make choices," because a rape involves more than a violent sexual act, it involves taking absolute control over someone's life, she said.

Women serving as educators on Jewish awareness at UM

By JEANETTE DEFORGE
Collegian Correspondent

Citing a need for people to be in touch with their ethnic and cultural backgrounds, two Jewish women at the University of Massachusetts are serving as Jewish awareness trainers for the campus.

Elise Young, who works in Hillel, a Jewish organization on campus, and Marcia Black, who works in the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy, (SCERA) both agree the training is needed to educate both Jewish and non-Jewish people about Jewish culture and are currently setting up workshops on campus for that purpose.

Elise Young — "I will never be free until everyone is."

They are available to talk on a personal basis with people who have had problems with anti-Semitism, and there is now a grievance procedure to deal with that issue, they said.

"We give personal and institutional support," Young said.

Black said, "A lack of knowledge and specific stereotypes," are major problems surrounding the Jewish community. These have led to instances of name calling, defacement of posters and anti-Semitic graffiti.

Women On Campus

She said there has also been ignorance of Jewish holidays at UMass. This year the Jewish community fought successfully to have the date for the first day of classes changed so it would not fall on Rosh Hashana, the Jewish New Year, she said.

This semester Young said she wants to focus on training the faculty and having people realize that students have encountered anti-Semitism in classes.

"People are making an effort to combat anti-Semitism," she said.

Young said she would also like to unite all the anti-oppression groups on campus and help combat all forms of discrimination.

"I will never be free until everybody is," she said.

Besides the training, Black said she would like to help people explore theater, music, oral histories and other forms of Jewish art and expression.

"I hope to have an accredited troupe of students to create plays that explore Judaism in the past and present. They will use materials that students write and excerpts from Yiddish plays," Black said.

Schedule books available today

The Spring 1984 Official Schedule of Courses will be distributed from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. today in the Campus Center Concourse. Only one copy will be distributed per person. The Course Schedule Pamphlet will be available at the Scheduling Office in Whitmore beginning Monday.

Women camp on Common, oppose deployment of missiles

By DIANE LANE
Collegian Staff

More than 20 women held a candlelight vigil and camped out on the Amherst Common Tuesday night, "emphasizing solidarity" with a British women's group which opposes the planned deployment of American cruise missiles in England.

The Amherst encampment coincided with hundreds of other encampments for peace across the country in support of the Greenham Women Against Cruise Missiles, which filed a lawsuit Wednesday in New York Federal Court against President Ronald Reagan and his administration to prevent the planned "illegal" deployment of cruise missiles in Greenham, England, in eight weeks.

CAMPING OUT — Margaret Holt a member of the Amherst Disarmament Coalition, stands by the banner Wednesday in the Amherst Common. The protesters' tents are in the background.

Felice Yeskal, a member of the Amherst encampment, said all the encampments have joined together in sending a telegram of support to the Greenham women saying, "The action you take is from all of us....together we will stop deployment."

The Amherst encampment and vigil included anti-nuclear banners, and peace songs, the singing of which attracted numerous people from the town, who joined the vigil.

"I thought the continuous coming and going of people to the group was wonderful. It was very exciting," said Marcia Black, a member of the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA) at the University of Massachusetts, who attended the vigil.

The women, who will be joined by more women and men today, plan to stay on the Common until Saturday night. They will continue to hold candlelight vigils and have begun weaving a woolen "web of life" around the encampment to symbolize the women involved with the peace movement.

Phyllis Rodin, a graduate student in future studies at the University of Massachusetts, said she feels that many people are "paralyzed by the violence in the media."

"If there is to be a future (of the world) it has to be female. Men are caught in a syndrome of violence," Rodin said.

According to the Greenham women 96 cruise missiles will be deployed in Greenham in less than eight weeks and hundreds more will be deployed in Sicily, West Germany, Holland and Turkey.

"The cruise missiles are too small to be verified by spy satellites and once they are deployed it will be impossible to talk about a verifiable nuclear weapons freeze," Rodin said.

Rodin also said the cruise missiles use "launch on warning" system controlled totally by computers and "there have been thousands of computer mistakes" recently.

Johansen has stagnated

DAVID JOHANSEN
Thursday, Nov. 3
Bluewall, 7:00 show

By JIM FEIN
Collegian Staff

Toward the end of the summer of 1982, David Johansen seemed to be the next solo performer destined for rock and roll stardom. After all, he had firmly established himself as the "tour de force" on the club circuit of the Northeast, and had just released a live album (Live It Up) that successfully captured the energy of his live performances. After attending his Aug. 1982 concert at the Metro, in Boston, I was a believer.

Now, some fifteen months later, little has changed and David Johansen's career is at a standstill. Not only has he failed to release any new material since 1981 (Here Comes The Night), but more importantly, his live performances remain basically unchanged over the interim. The first of his two shows at the Bluewall last Thursday night (all ages, no alcohol) is a good example. Nine of the thirteen songs in that hour long set ("Funky But Chic," "Melody," "Frenchette," "Personality Crisis," etc.) do appear on Live It Up. Yet, in spite of the repetitive nature of the show, a David Johansen concert remains an enthusiastic, rock and roll celebration.

David Johansen is, quite simply, a natural. His wide range of facial expressions, coupled with his special ability to "act out" the lyrics to his songs, make him one of rock's more vibrant performers. A case in point was his version of the Four Tops' "Reach Out, I'll Be There," one of the evening's highlights. During the song he moved along the edge of the stage, reaching out into the crowd and grasping every available hand. Then, much to the surprise of the small but enthusiastic crowd, he joined them on the dance floor, letting the mike circulate throughout the crowd.

The show did contain a few other surprises as well. One was an old New York Dolls' song entitled "Pills." Another was "I'm A Lover," a song from Johansen's debut L.P. The song, a nonmacho plea to a potential lover, began with a soliliquy in which Johansen explains how true he would be to her. In light of the "party" atmosphere, this plea sounded totally ridiculous, and some of the crowd began laughing. Johansen, often quite the clown himself, and trying hard to keep a straight face, finally broke down as well, only to be saved by his band, who began playing at just the right moment.

The band, by the way, are a group of talented musicians who sounded very tight and complimented Johansen quite well. A new keyboard player, not long with the band, was especially good. Guitarist David Nelson was too self indulgent though, launching into far too many solos.

Once again, the major problem with the show was a lack of new material. Whether or not David Johansen fades into obscurity depends on what new material he has to offer. One new song, an attempt at white reggae entitled "Stephanie," was especially good, so maybe there is hope. In the meantime though, if you've yet to see David Johansen, by all means do. You may be pleasantly surprised.

Script mars Dead Zone

THE DEAD ZONE
directed by David Cronenberg
Hampshire 4 Theaters

By ELIZABETH LUCIANO
Collegian Staff

You never know quite what to expect when sitting down to a film drawn by horror writer Stephen King. You may be treated to a chillingly unforgettable tale like The Shining, or such remarkably melodramatic trash as the interminable Creepshow. The newly released The Dead Zone falls between these two extremes.

The plot revolves around blankly named everyman John Smith, a rather serious schoolteacher, who is severely injured in a traffic collision. He awakens from a coma five years later, in a posh private clinic, to find his former fiance, Sarah, married to another man, himself a half-decade behind on "current" events, and his parents aged a score of years with worry.

But the unfortunate hero's problems don't end there. While still in the clinic, he accidentally discovers that he has developed the ability -- be it a curse or a blessing -- of being able to see people's pasts or futures by grasping their hands.

While still recovering from his long illness, John finds himself thrust into the role of an extrasensory Superman. He foresees, and thus prevents, the death of his nurse's daughter, and the drowning of a boy he tutors, in an ice-hockey mishap. And after a bit of persuasion, John uses his talents to solve a gruesome series of assaults and murders on young women in the community.

However, life is no bed of roses for John Smith. Still sickly, he must deal with being branded as a freak, eluding favor-seekers, and even becoming the target of a very angry woman with a very well-aimed gun.

Smith is finally pitted against a vicious, power-hungry political candidate, Gregg Stillson, masterfully portrayed by Martin Sheen. The hero's struggle between personal privacy and benevolence highlights the movie as Smith must decide whether or not to make the supreme sacrifice of his own life.

Although this sort of mystical plot has plenty of potential, the script is very stilted, making what were intended to be dramatic scenes awkward, overplayed and nearly ludicrous. Although all of the actors, notably Christopher Walkens, obviously did their best with such poor screenwriting, one gets the feeling that they are much more capable than the film made use of.

Although The Dead Zone has some very fine acting and an intriguing original concept, these are outweighed by the embarrassingly shoddy script, which pervades and nearly ruins the movie. The final verdict: if there's nothing else to do on Saturday night, go and see it. But otherwise, don't go out of your way.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

We don't live in a zoo

I know it's going to happen again this year.

It happens every time I go home for Thanksgiving vacation.

I go to my hometown annual Thanksgiving Day football game but instead of watching the game I find myself trapped in one small talk conversation after the other. Sometimes it's really fun talking to people I haven't seen since my high school graduation, but most of the time I run out of things to talk about. It seems like everyone who comes home from their colleges for Thanksgiving and the football game end up asking the same questions year after year.

Miriam Zoll

"Hi! How are you?," they ask.

"Great. Just great. How's school this year?"

"School's going fine. A lot of work this semester. How about you? Where are you going to school?"

"UMass," I tell them.

"Oh," they say with a big grin, "You mean the Zoo?!"

"No," I explain with a sigh, "I mean UMass, and it's not even close to being a zoo."

For the past three years I've had to listen to my former schoolmates, many of whom now go to private schools, slander UMass. I realize they have no way of knowing that UMass is like in 1983, but referring to it as "Zoo Mass" is like saying the Go-Go's are "groovy."

UMass has changed a lot over the last decade and it seems to have successfully shed its reputation as being a "zoo," at least with the press. But UMass is still one of the biggest partying schools on the East Coast, which, one has to admit, attracts a lot of potential students. But beneath that carefree, "party your brains out" surface impression, UMass is also attractive because it is ranked among the top twenty schools in the United States.

Many people from Massachusetts are amazed to learn that UMass is regarded as a highly respected educational institution by members of the academic community. After years of criticizing the best public university in the Commonwealth, they must find UMass' academic reputation harder to believe than its partying reputation.

Besides thinking of UMass only as a "party school," (what college or university isn't a party school?) a lot of the people I run into at Thanksgiving time usually comment on the size of UMass, Amherst. Some of them say they could never "handle" going to a school as big as UMass because they wouldn't get that "one-on-one relationship with their professors" that they get at their smaller, private schools.

They've got a point there. Small, private schools do have fewer people enrolled in classes, and maybe the professors have the chance to give individual attention to their students. But there are hundreds of professors at UMass who offer individual help to students through office hours and small group study sessions. Many professors at UMass, who teach in lecture halls and classrooms that are so overcrowded there is hardly an extra seat to sit in, care just as much, if not more, about educating students as the professors at the private schools do. Besides, crowded classrooms and the large size of the student body is what makes UMass such an interesting and stimulating place to go to school. Where else but UMass could jocks, preps, punkers, rastas, Deadheads, burnouts, "earthy-crunchies," radicals, brains, conservatives, "glamour" girls, political activists...share the same space peacefully? Unlike smaller schools where peer pressure often forces conformity among the students, UMass students have more freedom to be "different" without automatically being labeled a "freak."

People decide to come to UMass for different reasons. Five years ago UMass was popular because it had spring concerts that featured groups like the Grateful Dead and the Allman Brothers. Other people like UMass because of the academics, the political activity or the chance to live in a co-ed dorm. Whatever the reasons are, UMass proves to be one of the best places for young people to learn about themselves, other people, and what's going on in this crazy world.

Thanksgiving is two weeks away, and as a devoted fan and loyal defender of UMass ideals, I am anxious to have the chanee to shatter the "Zoo Mass" myth once again. I just know I'm going to have the chance to do it.

'Born again with fascist cravings'

Notice anything different about recent Collegians? All the cover stories dealt directly or indirectly with the latest world crises: Lebanon and Grenada. It seems to me that the world events are taking high priority in our community at the University of Massachusetts. And well they should be. This is not to say that the Collegian or UMass usually takes no interest in these areas, but rather that interest has greatly risen in the recent past. Do you wonder what brought these situations to such a high priority? If you are not sure "what," then I shall tell you right off it is "who." Still unsure? This "who" is the same one that made my parents spend more money for my college education by reducing financial aid. Not enough clues? The tipoff is that this "who" raised the national defense budget to $2 - 74 billion for fiscal 1984. You have just zeroed in on the "who:" President Ronald Reagan.

I'm sure that many of you are now thinking that this is just another vicious attack on the President. Let me say that I am not a radical leftist, communist, anarchist, or anything like that. I am a human being. I am also an American. And these days I am very scared as well. I am scared because the most powerful office in this nation is held by a confused and narrow thinking man. You can give me every conceivable argument about government spending, peace-keeping in Lebanon, and invasions in Grenada. My views on them may be right or wrong. One thing that I am right about is that President Reagan's current policies are of a violent nature. And I am dead right that violence breeds only more violence. Nothing shall persuade me otherwise.

What is my point here? Is it that the Collegian and UMass are heavily concerned about international affairs? Or is it that I am condemning or condoning the President's policies? My point is best summed up by the hardcore band, The Dead Kennedys: (Oh no, you say, a punk rocker as well)

"I am Emperor Ronald Reagan,
Born again with fascist cravings,
Still, you made me President"

I am not saying that Reagan is a bona fide fascist, but that we made a mistake by putting him in office. His actions are not only detrimental to students and foreign governments, but to the future of mankind as a whole. The power he holds is great, and I feel he is abusing it. I strongly urge everyone to use their vote to dethrone the "Emperor" in 1984. I do not recommend this because I want to install a particular candidate either rightist or leftist, but to help our race survive.

Neal O'Shea is a UMass student

Why tuition needs to be raised

Well, well, well. Chancellor Duffey's proposed tuition hike has been nixed — temporarily, anyway. I must be the only person on campus who's sorry about that.

Elizabeth Luciano

Don't misunderstand me. I'm not a weirdo who'd relish adding a little financial fat to the University. It's just that getting around campus could be so much easier if Mr. Duffey would sink those extra tens and twenties into a worthwhile mass transit system. (Or should I say UMass transit system?).

For instance, plenty of people could use a moving sidewalk from Franklin Dining Commons to Orchard Hill. If it were routed through Central, those students could just jump off when it reached their particular dorm. But wait — it would have to be shoveled during February. What a nuisance!

Maybe a chair-lift could be installed there, instead. Some philanthropic fraternity could have their pledges dismantle Mt. Tom's lift and bring it over here. That would be an exciting but benevolent project. Then we could assemble and "borrow" it for a few months, just to see whether we like it enough to buy one of our own. What a great way to meet potential "flames." It always works on the Certs commercial, right?

Better yet, why not implement a helicopter service from Van Meter and the Southwest Towers to the Tower Library? Maybe the ROTC people would be willing to procure and pilot the 'copters. A little favorable publicity wouldn't hurt them at all, at least not on this campus. Perhaps the Parachute Club could work out some kind of deal with them, too. (I, for one, love seeing parachuters suddenly appear over Haigis Mall with their cheerfully colored canopies).

But wait, that's not fair. It excludes the people in Northeast and Sylvan, not to mention the firefighters who live at North Station. An egalitarian transportation system would be a subway connecting all the major buildings on campus. The Campus Center could serve as UMass' own Grand Central Station, since it's presently comparable to that, anyway and I'm sure the University Store could be talked into selling tokens. They're already milking us for everything from protractors to Peppermint Patties.

Or maybe we could all get from class to class via hot air balloons, trolley cars, or Budweiser Clydesdales. Wouldn't that be fun?

On second thought, I've put on a few pounds in the few weeks. Forget it, I'll just hoof it.

Press censorship in Grenada -Pro's and Con's

What if this nation waged a successful war, its cause was just, the people gave it overwhelming support — and the press wasn't allowed to cover it? Sound strange to you?

Well, it just happened in Grenada.

Don't get me wrong. I am not reneging on my complete and unequivocal support for the Reagan Administration's wisest foreign policy move to date. It was just so good that it's a bigger shame our citizens couldn't watch more of it.

To be frank, I enjoyed this show of force — and I hope it gives the Nicaraguans and Cubans something to think about; never mind their Soviet overlords.

Now, I can understand Admiral Metcalf's misgivings about having a large press contingent roaming around during the early hours of the invasion. The memories of how the media, particularly television, helped the cause of the Communists during the Vietnam War are fresh in mind, and undoubtedly Metcalf's mind too. Who wants some civilian editorializing during the same "objective" report he's supposed to be giving the folks back home?

Yes, my friends — there is a liberal, anti-Pentagon bias held by many reporters, and television commentators. Vietnam and Watergate greatly helped to shape the attitudes of many reporters.

To some degree, this is understandable since many reporters were lied to during the periods listed above. But now everybody with a pad 'n pencil coming out of journalism school wants to be the next Woodward and Bernstein. "Don't trust a damn one of them," seems to be the new prevailing attitude.

Since cynicism and skepticism are the dominating "isms" within the news industry — Metcalf should've been more aware that by censoring the events on Grenada — he was virtually giving the media a loaded weapon for its use in the future.

Never mind that the mission was a great success, and our Rangers and Marines demonstrated their abilities in a highly professional and dignified manner: the media will forever hold yet another grudge not only against the Pentagon, but also President Reagan.

Instead of being praised for his prompt and necessary actions, President Reagan is getting the same old treatment the media gave Lyndon Johnson during the Vietnam War.

It always amazed me how the scribes become sudden "experts" on complicated subjects. But now I know how the twin "isms" I listed earlier are so quickly applied. Don't give the media their bones, and pretty soon you'll have a crowd of angry canines barking at you from all angles. Which is what the President is facing from the press — particularly the press in the Northeast.

The very same industry which has in its midst some of the most pacifist and appeasement-minded workers seem overly enamored about war reportage.

The very same people who are now doubting our reasons for being in Grenada couldn't wait to get there. But for what? Can anyone hardly blame Adm. Metcalf for asking this question, given the experience of Vietnam? No, but unfortunately, I think he was over cautious — and for this, the media turned on him, and his boss: President Reagan.

By not allowing the media to go in, even just a handful of hours after the first troops had arrived, the Admiral only gave reporters more grist for their paper and television mills.

Immediately, comparisons with the Soviets in Afghanistan, and other nations were brought up by liberal commentators. Never mind the fact that we didn't set up a pretext for invasion like the Soviets did in Afghanistan. Unlike the Soviets who had their hands in the affairs of the Afghani government long before they invaded; we were effectively shut out of Grenada for nearly four straight years. We were also asked by other nations fearing for their safety to do something about the thugs in St. Georges. The Grenadians didn't have any quislings like Barbrak Karmal to "invite" the invaders in.

But, how the media picked up the comparisons between our invasion and that of the Soviets in Afghanistan so quickly without even giving a closer glimpse of recent history.

Well, we know how hard historical facts can gum up a good story. But instead of winning only the military aspect of the war; the military could've also won the greater support of the American public via the press. It's a tribute to our soldiers and government that they have won public support for the invasion; inspite of an industry which already antagonistic — didn't need to be aroused anymore — particularly by unnecessary censorship.

Steven P. Barrett is a Collegian columnist

"To say they were kept out for their own good is an insult to the men and women who have died covering wars." Ed Joyce, CBS News President, had these words last week when asked his views on the Administration's peculiar blockade of journalists from Grenada. It was an unprecedented act. An act of censorship so blatant that Joe Rosenthal, a photographer who orginally captured the Marines erecting the flag on Iwo Jima, would be furious. It raises a question that could haunt the Administration longer than the propriety of the attack itself. Was there, indeed, any justification for barring the press from covering this vital occurence?

One reason given for the press blockade was that the safety of the journalists could not be guaranteed. There are more dangerous places in the world — Beirut and El Salvador — where journalists are reasonably free to go wherever they wish. No one is guaranteeing their safety, and, more importantly, no one is asking for it. When Eisenhower landed his troops on Normandy the press was there. Important U.S. battles dating back to the Civil War, and on through Korea and Vietnam, have never so hindered the rights of the press. So why now? What was the Administration hiding?

Another reason for the blockade was the absolute need for secrecy so vital to the surprise attack. But the U.S. press has a fine track record with respect to keeping lids on military secrets. In 1965, when President Johnson sent the Marines into Santa Domingo, no journalists leaked confidential information about prebattle briefings. And in 1970, when the Marines secretly crossed into Cambodian territory, Gen. Creighton Adams lent his helicopter to the press and trusted them to hold their reports until the fighting began.

But this air of cooperation and trust is suddenly absent from the Administration. When considering our most basic rights — the Bill of Rights — there can only be outrage after the fact. The freedom of the press is vital because it protects all other freedoms. When the press is told what news they can or cannot cover it is a scary, Orwellian thing. No, there are no justifications.

Keep the flag at half staff

To the Editor,

When the Marines were killed in Lebanon the Stars and Stripes in front of the Whitmore Administration Building was put on half staff. Two days after, when the Marines defeated "the leftist thugs" on Grenada, it stayed there. Wouldn't it save the ROTC students (or whoever is in charge of the flag) a lot of trouble if we simply left the flag on half staff as long as Ronald Reagan is president of this country?

Dead birds are uncool

To the Editor,

We work in John Adams Dormitory in Southwest, and we just came across somebody's idea of a funny joke: a dead bird in the ice cream machine. Apparently, someone caught this bird, and either broke it's neck and stuck it in there, or let it freeze alive. If whoever killed that bird is reading this, we just want you to know that we felt this joke worthy of sharing with the entire campus, and we'd both get a big kick out of someday finding your head(s) in the same place.

Are religious people silly?

To the Editor,

Iam writing to express my great displeasure at R. Miller's recent comic strip where one character queries, "Did you know that Jesus died for you sins?", only to be answered by another, "I didn't even know he was sick!"

Aside from the fact that this is a very old joke it shows a great lack of respect for the beliefs of many individuals on this campus. Mr. Miller seems to think that people who believe that Jesus Christ died for the sins of humankind are very silly. Are people really silly for believing in the substitutionary death of Jesus Christ?

Two things should be pointed out. First, Jesus Christ claimed to be God, which in my opinion leaves a thinking individual with only three options - He was either crazy thinking He was God when He wasn't, or He was a liar and made it all up to fool people, or He was who He claimed to be.

This brings me to my second point. What kind of evidence do we have available to us in the twentieth century to determine who He was? Something happened 2000 years ago that the world hasn't gotten over yet. Why was the tomb empty? When I view the evidence I come to the conclusion that the most probable solution is a bodily resurrection.

If the resurrection really did take place then it would make sense to listen to Jesus when He claims to be able to forgive sins. If it's a farce then Mr. Miller is correct and Christians are indeed very silly. The question I leave with him and with all of us is, how have we come to our conclusions? Do we just believe popular hear about 'born agains' or have we examined the historical evidence for ourselves?

We thank you plasmatics

To the Editor,

The American Red Cross Blood Services would like to whole-heartedly thank The Collegian for supporting our recent "BIG UMass" blood drive.

The first day of the drive ended way under goal with collections amounting to 111 pints of blood; we needed to reach a goal of 180 pints per day for each of the 3 days. Since we depend so heavily on the donors at UMass, it was critical for us to turn that trend around. We turned to you. Your prompt response to the situation brought an enormous reaction from the student population.

On the second day, collections rose dramatically to 187 pints. We were pleased and relieved. The overall comments from the students were that they had read of our need in The Collegian. Their dedication to the cause really shown "proud" on the third day when collections sky-rocketed to 219 pints!

We have you and the students of UMass to thank; your efforts were worthwhile. We can't thank you enough or express to you the value of your assistance by promoting the second two days of the drive. Many patients in area hospitals will be helped. Those few words in last Wednesday's newspaper made all the difference in the world.

We are better than they

To the Editor,

It has been suggested by some people that the recent US-led invasion of Grenada was no different than the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan a few years ago. These people are either forgetting or intentionally ignoring a very basic and extremely important difference between the two actions.

The Soviet Union invaded Afghanistan for the purpose of installing a totalitarian regime; in contrast, US and other forces invaded Grenada for the purpose of removing a totalitarian regime.

This does not mean that the legitimacy of the invasions of Grenada should not be vigorously debated, but any direct comparison between that invasion and the invasion of Afghanistan is ridiculous and irresponsible.

Nuclear waste in the C.C.

To the Editor,

Pursuant to a request from Collegian staff on October 26, 1983, engineers from this office investigated a black material discharging to the sanitary facilities located behind the Collegian office. At this time it was found that the discharge was the result of flushing the sprinkler lines in that portion of the Campus Center building.

Thank you for your concern.

FILM
DEATH BY HANGING
Directed by: Nagisa Oshima
A Japanese film about the capital punishment in Japan will be shown Nov. 13 CC 904-08 show times: 12, 2, 4 pm FREE
DEATH BY HANGING
Directed by Nagisa Oshima
"Have you ever seen an execution?" asks the opening title. Death by Hanging describes the execution chamber and ceremony in detail, then proceeds to show the execution of a young Korean worker found guilty of raping and strangling two women. The condemned man is hanged according to the rules yet he refuses to die and must be taken down. He remembers nothing of his crimes so the officials attempt a re-enactment, creating a grotesque parody imbued with racial discrimination. This provocative, exhilarating and theatrical film was inspired by a real incident which Oshima fashioned into an absurdist attack on the Japanese system of justice in particular and capital punishment in general.

The Most Sophisticated Training Ground For Nuclear Engineering Isn't On The Ground.

It's on a Navy ship.
The Navy has more than 1,900 reactor-years of nuclear power experience—more than anyone else in America. The Navy has the most sophisticated nuclear equipment in the world. And the Navy operates over half of the nuclear reactors in America.
With a nuclear program like that, you know the Navy also offers the most comprehensive and sophisticated nuclear training.
Every officer in the Nuclear Navy completes a full year of graduate level technical training. Outside the Navy, this kind of program would cost you thousands. In the Navy, you're paid while you learn.
Then, as a nuclear-trained officer, you supervise highly trained personnel in the operation of the most advanced nuclear propulsion plants ever developed. You get a level of technical and management experience unequalled anywhere else.
You get important responsibilities and you get them fast. Because in the Navy, as your knowledge grows, so do your responsibilities.
Today's Nuclear Navy is one of the most challenging and rewarding career choices a man can make. And that choice can pay off while you're still in school. Qualified juniors and seniors earn approximately $1,000 per month while they finish school.
As a nuclear-trained officer, after 4 years with regular promotions and pay increases, you can be earning as much as $40,500. That's on top of a full benefits package that includes medical and dental care, and 30 days' vacation earned each year.
As a nuclear-trained officer, you also earn a place among this nation's most qualified and respected professionals. So, if you're majoring in math, engineering or the physical sciences, send in the coupon. Find out more about the most sophisticated training ground for nuclear engineering. Today's Nuclear Navy.

UM women in NCAA quarter finals

FIELD HOCKEY IN NCAA PLAYOFFS — The University of Massachusetts will face the winner of the Temple — Univ. of Penn. game on Sunday at the UPenn in Philadelphia. UMass, who is seeded third in the twelve team tourney, has a record of 13-2-2. The Minutewomen already own a 1-0 win over Temple and has not met UPenn. Pennsylvania will have the home-field advantage, (UMass NOPE field wasn't suitable) and Temple will have US team goalie Robin Porter in the nets.

UMass, in their earlier game with the Owls, dominated and outshot Temple 22-5. But since it's the national tournament, previous games mean nothing. The future is now. "We are real excited about the NCAA's," said coach Pam Hixon. "We have a good strong nucleus." UMass features eight seniors. The winner of the UMass game advances to the Final Four next weekend. Above, Chris Kocot drives past a Rhode Island player earlier in the season.

Soccer hosts Brown

By ADAM NAZIMOWITZ
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team puts it all on the line this Sunday at 1 p.m. on Boyden Field as they face 10th ranked Brown University in the quarterfinals of the NCAA playoffs.

UMass seeded third, defeated Brown earlier this season here by a score of 3-1. Ellen Taggart, Stacey Flionis and Lori Stukes scored for the Minutewomen, while Ellen Bopp scored the lone goal for the Bruins as the defense was solid during the match.

"They have a lot of young excellent talent, and recruit well-seasoned soccer players from all around the country. We have to take the game to them, because they are very dangerous, and we can't make them feel comfortable," said coach Kalekeni Banda.

The Minutewomen have a well balanced scoring attack led by Flionis' eight goals and 18 points. She is followed by Ellen Tagart with 12 points, Nadia Komarowski with 11, Lori Stukes with nine, and Chris Taggart with eight. Goaltenders Jeanne Paul and Lisa Ellis both compiled super goals against averages. Paul's is 0.17, and Ellis is 0.75.

"When you're number one or three, everyone wants to take a shot at you, and you can't take anything for granted. The long layoff might make us a little rusty in the first five minutes, but we have enough experience to overcome it. A good team needs to go to tournaments and see the competition," said Banda.

The 10-2-3 record and number three ranking represent the best UMass has accomplished. They are an experienced team who has been to playoffs before. The Minutewomen have been in the NCAA playoffs the last three years, but has never made it to the Final Four.

"The key players are the Taggart sisters. If we get a good game from them, we will do well. We need leadership and play-making from Chris and hustle from Ellen. We will try to get the ball to them more, because when they are hot, we dominate," said Banda.

"The other veterans must show leadership and composure. The defense must be at its best this year, like in Cortland. The home field advantage will help us psychologically, and we know the field we're playing on. Win or lose, we will gain a lot of respect across the country," added Banda.

Sophomore Martha Ruble is questionable for the game, while Banda hopes freshman Michell Rodney, a defensive substitute will be healthy and act as a sparkplug. Jamie Watson is still out.

Minutemen to finish YC slate at explosive UNH

By BILL SHEA
Collegian Staff

The rollercoaster ride for the 1983 University of Massachusetts football team is coming to an end and head coach Bob Pickett and his Minutemen will be looking reverse direction once again and finish the year on a upward swing.

UMass (3-6 overall, 2-2 conference) began the season 1-4, but won two straight Yankee Conference games against Maine and Boston University, before stumbling 16-6 against UConn and 21-20 last week at Lehigh.

If a common theme can be found for the 1983 football team it is that they can be their own worst enemy. From the season opening 45-13 loss to Toledo, where six Minutemen turnovers were converted into five touchdowns to last week at Lehigh, when UMass had 433 total yard had a 24-13 advantage in first downs and still lost because they turned the ball over six times.

The trend has become a familiar one. The defense makes a big play to give the offense good field position. The offense moves the ball well, gets inside the 15 yardline and fails to score. An interception, a bad snap, a holding penalty, a clipping penalty, whatever the special of the day is prevents the Minutemen from putting points on the board.

"We made too many mistakes that kept us out of the endzone," Pickett said last week after the Lehigh game.

If UMass has trouble finding the endzone when they take on the Wildcats of New Hampshire (6-3 overall, 2-2 conference) Saturday in Durham, N.H. in their final Yankee conference game, they could have big problems.

The Wildcats are riding a five game winning streak, including their last two conference games and have the leading scorer in the conference in tailback Andre Garron.

Garron, only a sophomore, leads the Wildcats in rushing (880 yards, 10 TD's) receiving (21 catches, 539 yards, 25 yard average, 4 TD's) and also averages 45 yards every kick-off return.

Junior Rick Leclerc runs the Wildcat offense. Leclerc is 83 of 155 through the air with eight touchdowns and seven interceptions. The Wildcats have run up some impressive numbers offensively. They beat AIC 31-0, scored 30 points against Holy Cross in a 42-30 loss, and also scored 52 points in a 52-28 rout of Lehigh.

Call helps UMass to win

By ED CUNNINGHAM

Two things were promised in the preview for last night's Springfield-UMass volleyball match. The first was that the contest would be thrilling, and it was! The second promise stated that only one team would prevail, and the University of Massachusetts did, by a nose.

It took UMass all five games of the 3 out of 5 match to secure an exciting victory over Springfield College.

The fifth and deciding game was everything the spectators and players expected, almost. UMass led early 5-3, causing Springfield to use one of their two timeouts. Springfield suddenly took command and sprung ahead of UMass 13-5.

Following a UMass timeout, the spikers closed the gap to 13-10. Now it was Springfields turn for their last timeout. This call didn't help at all, UMass continued to fight back, taking a 13-12 lead.

Enter the boisterous crowd. Springfield forgot their first timeout and tried to call a third but was merely warned that they had used up their two timeouts. Due to the crowd noise the coaches missed the judges warning and tried to call a fourth timeout. The score was 13-13, but the judge had to give a point to UMass for the infraction. The spikers capitalized and won the final point and the game 15-13.

Head Coach Elaine Sortino summed up the match this way, "It was a hell of a match...and that's a quote."

Games two and three went to UMass with scores of 15-13 and 15-7 respectively after Springfield took the first game, 15-12. The crowd, which would prove to be a boisterous one, was beginning to feel the excitement.

The fourth contest went to Springfield, 15-9. The spikers lost the game, but the team experienced a new sensation in NOPE, excellent crowd support, which helped the team to victory.

PIKE, Ball St. in IM finals

By BILL SHEA
Collegian Staff

It's not pro football, its not college football, and it isn't even high school football, but the intramural football playoff semifinals held their own for entertainment value.

The players wear flags on their hips. Nobody wears pads and the offensive line is asked to block without making contact, but the 1983 intramural semi-finalists still put on an exciting show.

The Ex-Hogsters had a chance to win the game in regulation. They came back from a 10-0 deficit on the strength of a Ronnie Manning to Mike Galvin touchdown bomb and a 20 yard field goal by Manning, before Manning attempted a 15 yard field goal with two seconds left in regulation. But Pike's Peter Lamb sent the game in overtime when he blocked the kick.

Pike drove to field goal range and Raditz nailed the game winning field goal to send Pike into the final today at 4:30 p.m. against Ball State.

State made a comeback of their own to advance to the final. Mennino hit Cahill with a touchdown pass and Reese Dozier picked off a Gus Leddy pitch and ran it into the endzone to give State a 13-12 lead.

The Mah Fah quarterbach Neil Kelliher hit Dizzy in the endzone with a 35 yard bomb with 35 seconds left before Mennino hit Cahill with the winning touchdown pass.

But the Mah Fah weren't done yet. After the kickoff Kelliher rolled right and fired to Leddy, who made an outstanding grab, but was ruled out of the endzone.

In the Co-rec final Simple Crustatcians captured their second straight title with a 31-21 win over the Chadbourne Maroons. The Crustatcians are 16-0 over the last two years.

Dining Out/Entertainment

Eateries cure the DC blues

By TAMI BORTON

Students tired of dining common fare or itchy offcampus dwellers need not travel any further than Amherst center to find a variety of fine dining and entertainment.

A short walk from campus will bring those out for a bite or drink to the Carriage Shop complex where restaurants, a deli, a pizza place, bars and even a night club are located.

Dastardly Dan's is the first stop. It offers video games, drinks and a chance to meet some of its regulars. Next door is The Sub, a take-out or eat-in salad and grinder shop.

Charlie's and The Pub are also located side by side. While both serve sandwiches and the like, Charlie's has daily drink specials, video games, a pool table, a jukebox and a dart board. The Pub also offers a daily happy hour, video games and pool, plus a disc jockey and dancing.

La Mia Pizza is also located in the Carriage Shops and serves pizza. La Mia delivers, provided the order is large enough. Amherst Deli, highly acclaimed by the Valley Advocate's annual reader's poll, serves deli sandwiches, dishes, salads, bagels and desserts.

Silverscape Cafe, across the common from the Carriage Shops, serves natural food entrees, salads, breads and desserts. For a less expensive, more casual vegetarian meal, one might try the Face of Earth Cafe.

A short walk up Pleasant Street brings one to Classe Cafe, new to Amherst, Classe Cafe serves breakfast and lunch and a Sunday brunch featuring special pancakes and other goodies.

Continuing toward the center brings the hungry or thirsty walker to another cluster of shops housing restaurants and bars. La Raclette and Judies, both serving French food, offer more expensive dishes than other restaurants in the area, but both atmospheres are very nice and the food is distinct. Judies new sit-down bar is sure to attract many who have a passion for Irish coffee, and the glassed-in patio is great for watching people while enjoying lunch.

Delano's Restaurant and bar attracts a lot of young people for lunch, dinner or its two for one happy hour, from 10 to 12 p.m. Their menu offers sandwiches, burgers, salads and omelettes.

The newly renovated "Barsies" offers a comfortable atmosphere, complete with MTV, Spotlight, and piped in music. A 4 p.m. - 8 p.m. happy hour, daily drink specials, and munchies available to midnite complete the scene.

Time Out, a good bar to throw down a couple of beers while watching the tube, is a favorite of UMass students and offers free popcorn, a jukebox, video games and a dart board along with libations.

Hiding "down the alley" is Taco Villa, serving fast, but very good, Mexican food. Beer is also served at Taco Villa. Amherst Chinese Food is a wonderful place to find Chinese food, void of monosodium glutamate, for lunch or dinner. Their luncheon specials are worth checking out. Kim Toy, a quaint restaurant, located next to Amherst Cinema, also serves Chinese food.

Plumbley's on the Common is an elegant place to eat, and Plumbley's Pub, located in the basement, periodically featuring live musicians, is a nice place for a relaxing cocktail.

Next to the Common is the Lord Jeffery Inn, which serves formal breakfasts, lunches and dinners, and is an excellent place to take the parents or grandparents.

Tucked into the shops along Main Street is the Gas Lite, great for quick breakfasts or lunches or a cup of coffee.

Across the street from the Amherst Cinema and Kim Toy is the Village Inn, also known as the Drake, a unique bar. The Drake has the largest selection of beer on tap in town, and serves sandwiches. Their breaded and fried french fries are well-known in Amherst. The downstairs bar houses one of the areas only public fussball tables.

Whatever the pleasure, fine dining or a quick sandwich, mixed drinks or a beer, a relaxed atmosphere or dancing, pizza, Mexican or Chinese food, it can be found in downtown Amherst, just a short walk away from UMass.

It's Happy Hour...

Valley has fine drink specials

By JOSH MEYER
Collegian Staff

And now for something newsworthy: a review of local Happy Hours in the Happy Valley. Most importantly, remember to follow the sequence described; the whole comprises more than the sum of its parts. What follows is a typical Thursday evening OUT.

After eating dinner at your favorite eatery, go home, change into that durable yet flexible, preppy yet rustic outfit, take a shower, and do anything else you might want to do to make this a lasting and enjoyable evening.

First, go to Judie's for an incredibly expensive but exotic concoction, now, while you can still appreciate it. Then sidle next door to the new Barsie's. As with Judie's, this place lacks any semblance of character, so have a quick one or two, and head to the Top Of The Campus (TOC) to take advantage of their two-fer-one and the great view of our prestigious and awe-inspiring campus. This is a great place for intimate conversations of a subtly sexual nature.

Synchronize your watches and make sure it's still early, because you have a long way to go. You'll be hungry again, so go to Websters (in the basement of Plumbley's) for 50 cent drafts and cheap but excellent chicken wings. Wipe the grease off your chin, and dash over to Brad's Grapevine (it's still The Drake, I don't care what anyone else says). Go upstairs and order pitchers of Black and Tans (half Guinness Stout and half Bass Ale) just to put a little hair on your teeth.

By now it should be ten o'clock and you might feel a buzz coming on. Boogie over to Delano's, where an interesting crowd and a buck-a-piece imports await. You're having fun by now, so stay for an hour, and drink heavily (Two-fers on all mixed drinks abound, though one wonders if the booze isn't distilled on the premises).

You are now ready to go to Mike's Westview, a bastion of Thursday night regulars and hard-cores, and a good mix of other UMies. Shot-and-a-rock is less than a buck and a half, so make a lot of toasts to nothing in particular, and take advantage of this deal. Revel in the "comfortable" atmosphere, complete with spilt beer on the pool tables and people getting sick in the bathroom. You might want to wear something waterproof, because someone will spill their drink on you. You can be sure of this. Stay until you are kicked out, and head down the road to Seven O's as fast as you can, because everyone else will be going there too (it's open until two, at least).

By now you're having so much fun that you and your friends won't want to leave. So don't. Wait until you're kicked out, but leave before you get beat up by student-hating townies, who frequent "the O's" every night, and hate those drunken idiots that raid the place every Thursday at one o'clock.

Hopefully by now you've made arrangements as to what afterhours party to go to. Since you'll be wasted by this point, find some responsible person to drive you there, if you can. You probably won't, so drive slowly and carefully, and stay between the lines. And hey, be careful out there.

No food like fast food, greasy, fat and...oooh!

By MARY CRESSE
Collegian Staff

As any inveterate chow hound will tell you, short of McDonald's, Burger King, Wendy's, or any other national food establishment using air as a main ingredient, there seems to be a lack of prime munchy food in Amherst; the kind that ususally comes in a greasy wax bag and adds calories, and usually lots of salt and sugar, to the appetite that seems to creep up as quickly and unexpectedly as the party that formed a few hours before.

We're talking real food, here, people. Cheap food, good food, from the kind of place heard of only by word of mouth, from say, a woman whose boyfriend knew a guy who used to rent the place to the former owner. Places like these usually have no big signs or artsy menus. The customer is expected to know what he or she wants before they get there, and until they do, the counter help usually attends to clearing and cleaning the counter of spilled ketchup and dirty paper plates.

Well, this is Amherst, not LA. This is Amherst, not Cambridge, Massachusetts. And no, this reviewer doesn't know of any place like that described above, or usually found in the cities listed above. Nyah.

That's the whole problem. Oh, these places exist, but most of the time a search for them lands people in either end of Amherst, when it's 2 p.m. and the stomach is growling an hour before class. Amherst Center is the thing, but since no amount of prayer will produce a real Jewish deli, the stomach searches for the next best thing. That's what this article is about: the next best thing.

So, culinary proletariats, are we going to suffer? Are we going to be forced to eat at the Hatch for the rest of our college careers? Is it worth it to eat a sandwich on a loaf of bread which you could squeeze into an edible softball? Is that what Collegian readers want? No, no, no, people.

The desired thing is something that is cheap, to put it bluntly, and which will fill you up until dinner-time. Maybe something you can walk out of the store with and eat on the curb. That's all.

There are two, yup, two places chow hounds will settle for when the tolerance is low:

The Amherst Deli. These people call themselves the bagel engineers, and melted cheese on lox and the traditional cream cheese are favorites. The prices aren't as low as one would like, but they're not bad, $2.70 for a full sandwich. The bread is bakery and there are seven types of bagels. At the Carriage Shops The Sub, 33 East Pleasant St., offers subs bigger than usual — the price is less than usual, too, the fare is basic but good, and yet it fills. Try the roast beef.

The renovation will become complete when Ross installs his 15-inch video screen attached to a video recorder.

"It's going to be an entertainment place, really, where people can come in and stay all night," Ross says. "Usually, people go to eat at a place and then they leave to do something else."

Originally, Ross had planned to have the standard short order fare—potato skins, nachos, et al., but will expand the menu to serve hamburgers, club sandwiches, and steaks. Justin's will also cater, and lease space for special functions.

Why Frye?

How can boots that look this good, this much in style, be over a hundred years old? They're Frye Boots. Benchcrafted by skilled hands the same way since 1863.
So while the styles may change the quality will remain the same. The best.

JR's (not Ewing's) to open soon

Joey is now Justin, the watering hole is now a restaurant, bar, and dance spot, and it's time the place opened, after so much publicity, for crying out loud. Well, sports fans, it is, it is, most probably on Nov. 28, if all goes well.

Translation: Justin Ryan's, formerly Joey D's, the nightspot near the Price Chopper shopping plaza, is just about there — owner Bob Ross, a 23-year-old UMass alumnus and former Minutemen football player, has only to receive an okay from the Amherst Selectmen this Monday for a liquor license, and the doors will open.

Ross had wanted to open sooner, but became tripped up in the predictable legal snafus of establishing and having approved hours of operation, permits for recorded music, and capacity levels. Justin's will have a seating capacity of 280.

Eating at home down while eatery biz up

By TAMI BORTON
Collegian Staff

With busy course schedules, many students find themselves eating out night after night. But professionals, including an ever increasing woman professional workforce, also spend many a meal in restaurants, making a variety high quality, reasonably priced eateries a necessity in this community.

It is a little known fact, but easily comprehendible, that as personal incomes within the household go up, the number of meals eaten at home goes down. The reasons are as follows: when more money is made, more can be spent, therefore the extra cost of being waited on becomes less significant. Amherst residents are fairly affluent, with the towns businesses and educational institutions.

More time is spent away from home because higher paying jobs are generally more demanding, and when both husband and wife are working, eating out is the convenient and less expensive alternative to hiring a cook.

While the argument of high income levels does not ring true for most students, the convenience factor of eating out rates high.

Fortunately, the forces which bring wealth to this area bring ways to spend it in a culturally and economically varied selection of restaurants. Many are a short walk, drive or bus ride away.

From Frankies to the Red Barn Steak House both on route 9, Roosters (off 116) to Hunan Garden (on Rt. 9), there is something in Amherst for every taste and pocketbook.

Amherst students rally to protect fraternities

By PAUL BASKEN
Collegian Staff

More than 500 Amherst College fraternity members and sympathizers Friday rallied in a driving rain for almost an hour to protest the possible abolition of the college's Greek system.

Chanting "save our frats," the participants held umbrellas and signs demadning "liberte, egalite, fraternity," "Do it the Greek way," and "Was it over when the Germans bombed Pearl Harbor?" and listened attentively as the carefully staged event was addressed by its suit-and-tie clad speakers.

Fraternity presidents, a college alumnus, and faculty members spoke during the afternoon rally, which was called in response to the formation last month by the college's trustees of a committee to examine "the future of social life at the college."

The action followed acting President G. Armour Craig's recurculation of a white paper written by his predecessor, the late Julian Gibbs, which questioned how long fraternities could be allowed to continue at the 1,500-student private college.

Included among the rally's participants were members of the Alpha Delta Phi fraternity from the University of Massachusetts, which has a chapter at Amherst College.

"Fraternities must not be viewed as part of the problem, but rather as a vital agent for its remedy," said Mark Petracca, a professor in the Amherst College political science department and former president of the Inter-Fraternity Council at Cornell University.

Current Amherst College Inter-Fraternity Council President Hal Ball, who is also president of that school's Alpha Delta Phi chapter, told the rally the college's eight fraternities have adopted the six principles Gibbs advocated in his white paper, including the elimination of "hazing" during rush, the system being made readily accessible to every student, and that all houses be maintained in a safe and sanitary condition.

Warren Tolman, a 1982 graduate of the college and former president of the Student Assembly (the college's equivalent of UMass' Student Government Association), praised the coed system which was esablished in all fraternities in 1980.

"Such a novel idea deserves more than a four-year trial period," said Tolman, a former fraternity member.

He informed the rally participants of high support for the fraternity system among alumni, but warned, "if we fail to live up to the high standards we are setting, we will face the same danger we are now facing in five years."

Craig, who will be replaced by President-elect Peter Pouncey in June, last month informed students they have until December 1 to submit comments for consideration by the trustees, who are planning to vote on the matter in January in time to cancel spring rush if the system is eliminated.

Legal Services attorney loses $250,000 lawsuit

By ANNE McCRORY
Collegian Staff

SPRINGFIELD — A University of Massachusetts Legal Services Office attorney claiming constitutional and contractual violations in his hiring lost his $250,000 lawsuit against three University administrators.

After deliberating for 50 minutes Thursday, a six-member jury ruled unanimously in favor of defendents Dennis Madson, vice-chancellor for Student Affairs, Larry Benedict, then associate vice-chancellor, and Bryan Harvey, a former staff assistant, concluding the four-day, 14 witness trial in U.S. District Court.

Plaintiff Michael Pill declined to comment on the verdict and the likelihood of an appeal.

The mid-afternoon ruling followed an earlier motion to dismiss the case by defense attorney Jeffrey McCormick. Claiming there was "no evidence for the jury," to support Pill's claims, McCormick said Pill had "singled out these people (the defendants) when he technically could have sued others."

The jury recessed before McCormick made his comments. Judge Frank H. Freedman then dismissed two of the five counts claimed by the plaintiff.

The jury's decision was based on the remaining claims of First Ammendment, contractual and advantageous relations violations.

Pill, with his wife Carol Holzberg, claimed the three men used his past record of student advocacy and administrative opposition to deny him three professional appointments in 1979 and 1981. He was seeking compensatory and punitive damages for losses suffered when he was forced to seek "temporary consultant" status when his appointment for the position of Student Government Association legal counsel, approved by a search committee, was rejected in Madson's office.

Pill testified he performed all duties of a professional staff attorney but received no benefits for 15 months until he was admitted to the Massachusetts Bar, a stipulation he claimed had not been noted in job advertisements, nor made clear in his job description.

Pill was a member of the Iowa Bar and two federal courts, including one in Massachusetts, when he applied for the position which witnesses said would involve little if any litigation in state courts.

Pill questioned the fact he was not appointed for director of Student Activities and associate Dean of Students, which defense witnesses said resulted from the first search being thrown out for affirmative action reasons and a lack of qualifications in the second.

Madson said the sole reason he did not approve Pill's LSO appointment was because he was not a member of the state bar and because he "was concerned (whether Pill) could meet, with his qualities, the duties outlined in the job description."

While admitting he "knew nothing of (Pill's) reputation against administration processes," Madson said such views among staff were "not unusual." Following the announcement of the verdict, Madson said "It's nice to see justice work."

Four more fires reported on campus

By JOHN O'CONNELL
Collegian Staff

No one was injured and no property damaged in four fires that broke out on campus between late Wednesday night and early Friday morning last week, University of Massachusetts police reported.

The Amherst Fire Department and Emergency Health Services responded to fires in the Campus Center complex and in Grayson dormitory in the Orchard Hill Residential Area just before 1 a.m. Friday. Fires were also reported in the Student Union at 2:30 a.m. Friday and in Grayson sometime Thursday morning, but the Amherst Fire Department did not respond, police said.

Neither UMass police nor Amherst Fire Chief Victor Zambruski would say if the fires have been labeled suspicious.

Zambruski said an investigation into suspicious fires in Crampton dormitory in the Southwest Residential Area and Cashin dormitory in the Sylvan Residential Area "is being handled through the state trooper assigned to the state fire marshal's office."

An Amherst College student was arrested and charged with arson Sunday by the state trooper, Zambruski said. The officer on duty at the state police barracks in Northampton said he had no information on the arrest, since the arrest "was handled out of the District attorney's office" in Northhampton.

Posters on a metal door in Grayson dormitory were discovered burned at 7 a.m. Thursday, police said. No damage was reported, and police said the posters were burned some time between 11 p.m. Wednesday and 7 a.m. Thursday.

Police reported a fire in a third floor trash room in Grayson at 12:57 a.m. Friday. Amherst Fire Department and Emergency Health Services responded, but no damage was reported.

The two fires in the Campus Center/Student Union complex occurred in two women's bathrooms, police said. The first fire, discovered at 12:45 a.m. Friday was confined to trash barrels in the women's bathroom on the concourse level of the Campus Center. Amherst Fire Department and Emergency Health Services responded but no damage was reported.

No damage was reported at the second fire, discovered at 2:30 a.m. Friday in the women's bathroom on the first floor of the Student Union, police said. This fire was also confined to trash containers, police said, and the Amherst Fire Department was notified and advised no response was necessary.

Reagan returns from Asia today

SEOUL, South Korea (AP) — President Reagan wrapped up his Asian journey Monday amid fresh signs of tension on the Korean peninsula and with the White House arguing that human rights problems in the south must be measured against the military threat from the north.

As Reagan prepared to fly back to Washington, South Korean President Chun Doo-hwan said he had ordered artillery gunners to stand ready to fire if necessary to protect Reagan during his unprecedented trip Sunday into the demilitarized zone 30 miles north of Seoul. The DMZ, 2.4 miles wide and 151 miles long, divides North and South Korea.

Chun said he had hoped Reagan would change his mind about touring "such a dangerous place."

"While you were away in the front-line area, I ... ordered my forces to be prepared at all times to place an artillery barrage between you and the enemy," Chun told Reagan during a meeting at the Blue House, the presidential palace.

No problems occurred during Reagan's stop at the DMZ. Standing in a mortar bunker encircled by olive-drab sandbags, Reagan told American soldiers they were "our shield against the tyranny and the deprivation that engulfs so much of the world."

Violence in Lebanon continues

BEIRUT, Lebanon (AP) — Palestinian rebels rocketed PLO loyalist bunkers Sunday in Syrian-held north Lebanon, Druse militiamen fought Lebanese troops in the central mountains, and a car-bomb exploded in the Israeli-occupied south.

State radio said one Lebanese soldier was killed in the clashes in mountains overlooking Beirut. The Israeli military command in Tel Aviv said a boobytrapped car in the southern city of Tebnit killed two Lebanese civilians but the command did not give further details.

The mountain fighting waned after a few hours and did not affect U.S. Marines stationed at the airport. "All is quiet down here today," said Marine spokesman Capt. Wayne Jones.

Grenadians thankful for invasion

ST. GEORGE'S, Grenada (AP) — Thousands of Grenadians filled churches Sunday in a national day of thanksgiving for the U.S.-led invasion and to pray for the dozens of people who died in the country's crisis.

Cuba, too, mourned its dead. President Fidel Castro announced a three-day mourning period for the 37 Cubans he said died fighting the U.S.-led invaders.

Scattered gunshots were heard in Grenada's harborside capital at about 10 a.m. local time, but Maj. Douglas Frey, spokesman for the U.S. Army here, had no information about the shooting. He said that as of Sunday morning, there had been no casualties on the island in seven days.

High-tech will cause 'difficulties'

ROCHESTER, N.Y. AP — High technology will throw people out of work in coming years, causing a "period of discontinuity that will produce great political and social difficulties," says David Kearns, president of Xerox Corp.

Kearns said American industry must forge ahead with robotics and other labor- and cost-saving devices or "we will lose even more jobs," to efficient competitors such as Japan.

The United States must pass through a painful period of readjustment to attain manufacturing productivity to increase jobs in other parts of the economy, Kearns said Friday at a University of Rochester conference on U.S. manufacturing.

CIA director's holdings revealed

WASHINGTON (AP) — William J. Casey has acquired stock in companies that do business with the CIA since he took over as head of the agency, according to CIA documents recently made public.

The documents also disclose that Casey had stock in firms with classified CIA contracts when he took office in January, 1981, and that since then, has retained stock in firms with both classified and unclassified CIA cor.tracts.

Most of the documents, obtained in a Freedom of Information Act lawsuit, relate to CIA efforts to ensure that Casey's multimillion-dollar stock holdings do not pose any conflict of interest with his official duties.

The documents show that CIA attorneys and government ethics officials have found no conflicts.

Deleted from the documents are the names of companies with CIA contracts and the size of Casey's holdings.

TRAIN CRASH CLEAN-UP — Missouri Pacific employees work to clean up the wreckage caused by the derailment of an Amtrak Eagle in Marshall, Texas. Four people were killed in the accident.

Four killed in Texas train crash

MARSHALL, Texas (AP) — An Amtrak train derailed, killing four people and injuring dozens of others, after hitting a "separation in the track" in an area where crews had been working two hours earlier, a federal investigator said Sunday.

Donald Engen, a member of the National Transportation Safety Board from Washington, said Sunday a rail shattered in the accident would be the focus of the federal investigation into Saturday's derailment.

He said lab tests would be needed before it could be determined if the separated track caused the derailment. A final report from the NTSB probably won't be ready for at least four months, Engen said.

The two-engine, nine-car Eagle was bound for San Antonio from Chicago Saturday when the last five cars left the tracks deep in the East Texas woods.

Engen said 95 percent of the shattered rail was recovered and sent to a Union Pacific laboratory in Omaha, Neb.

"It's clear to see that the second wheel on the right-hand side of (the fourth car) has a very pronounced gouge that indicates that could be the first wheel to hit a separation in the track," Engen said.

Hee-Haw' comedian dead at 56

CUMMING, Ga. (AP) — Comedian Junior Samples, a regular on the televison show "Hee Haw" since 1969, had a heart attack at his home Sunday and died within an hour at a hospital. He was 56.

The deadpan delivery of the 300-pound comedian was considered the key to his humor on "Hee Haw." He once said his appearences "just 'bout ruint me" because his neighbors in Cumming took it for granted that he was rich and "they want me to pay my bills."

AROUND THE REGION

Sex education stymied in Athol

ATHOL, (AP) — Three years ago, the teen-age pregnancy rate in this depressed factory town was one of the highest in the state, and officials decided to consider having schools offer a human development course.

But a proposed health program that would run from kindergarten through high school is stalled and the high school's elective course on human development may be scrapped. On Tuesday, the School Committee is scheduled to consider whether to continue the class.

Leading the figlit against the course is committee member Richard Blanchard, who says "it is a question of teaching values." Blanchard objects to a book, called "Person to Person," used in the course, which he said advocates "the tenets of secularistic religion."

PCBs found in Vineyard bluefish

BOSTON (AP) - Two bluefish from Vineyard Sound tested recently by the Massachusetts State Laboratory contained more than twice the federal limit of a suspected cancer-causing agent, officials say.

The fish were the only ones taken from the area in a statewide test of 53 bluefish.

In results released last week, one Vineyard Sound fish showed a level of 12.6 parts PCB to one million parts fish; the other had 11.7 ppm. Federal standards set 5 ppm as the maximum and advises health warnings to be issued when fish have 2 PCB ppm.

The average PCB level in the 53 samples was 1.7 ppm.

Polychlorinated biphenyls were banned in 1977 after tests showed they caused cancer in rats and may cause cancer in humans.

Previously this fall, the highest level of PCB recorded in the state was 9.7 ppm in a fish from Buzzards Bay.

"We are seeing geographic differences and we sill look at them a lot more — at Buzzards Bay and Vineyard Sound particularly," said Ralph Timperi, assocaite director of the state laboratorym.

Flynn gaining ground

BOSTON (AP) — Boston city councilor Raymond Flynn seems to be gaining ground over opponent Mel King in the race for mayor, winning the support of half of the voters polled by The Boston Herald in a survey published Sunday.

King, a black activist, trailed Flynn with 34 percent of the vote in the poll of 800 registered voters. Twelve percent of the voters were undecided and 4 refused to respond, the newspaper said.

Several earlier polls put Flynn 10 percentage points ahead of King.

Bill Johnson and Associates of Mount Vernon, N.Y., conducted the random telephone poll for the Herald last Wednesday, Thursday and Friday. Respondents included voters registered since the preliminary election Oct. 11. The survey has a margin of error of 4 percent.

Boston voters go to the polls Tuesday to pick a successor for Mayor Kevin H. White, who is retiring after 16 years in office. It is the first time a black candidate has reached the finals of a Boston mayoral election.

Planes crash in Mass.

AP — A single engine American Yankee aircraft crashed on takeoff from Fitchburg Airport at dusk Sunday, rolling through a clump of trees and halting in the backyard of a home, officials said. Four people aboard were injured.

About the same time, witnesses in Hull, 50 miles to the east, saw a white single engine plane bank low over Nantasket Beach and crash offshore, Coast Guard officials said.

A search by two Coast Guard utility boats and a helicopter produced no sign of debris or passengers, said Chief Petty Officer John Mauro.

Three of the occupants in the American Yankee were treated and released at Burbank Hospital in Fitchburg, said Vicky Greene, hospital nursing supervisor.

A fourth was admitted and is in stable condition, she said.

She declined to give the names of the injured, and Fitchburg police said they were awaiting a report by investigators.

Weekend rally held to protest US invasions

By CAMDEN PIERCE
Collegian Staff

WASHINGTON - Approximately 300 people from the Amherst-Northampton area, including more that 100 University of Massachusetts tudents, joined thousands of people from around the nation Saturday in a march and rally protesting U.S. policies in Central America and Grenada.

"The North American eagle has fastened its talons on lands other than its own," said Rev. William Sloane Coffin, senior minister at Riverside Church in New YORK City, said to more than 20,000 people gathered behind the White House Saturday afternoon.

He admonished the crowd to "make like citizens and not like subject. We must keep our anger high."

Making a four-mile loop past the Immigration and Naturalization Service and Health and Human Services, the other two rally sites, the marchers chanted slogans such as "Hey, Hey, Ho, Ho, Ronald Reagan has got to go," and "More employment less deployment."

Circling the White House before emptying into a park nearby the march was temporarily impeded by a number of people who attempted to lay down in front of the marchers.

Eighteen people were arrested as a result of this action.

During the afternoon rally, speakers condemned Reagan Administration foreign policy as militaristic and racist, trying to draw connections between that policy and domestic social issues.

"We must see issues as interrelated," said presidential candidate Rev. Jesse Jackson. "We must start a new world order."

Rep. Ted Weiss, D-NY, accused President Reagan of abusing his power by invading Grenada.

Co-sponsor of a bill to impeach Reagan pending before the House, Weiss said the invasion violated the Constitution by usurping Congress' power to initiate war, and by actively preventing the press from covering the invasion.

Students from the University of Massachusetts who participated in the event were pleased with the demonstration.

Carolyn Oakley, a fifth-year music major, said she thought the march was well-organized and inspirational.

"I thought music was a real effective way of bringing people together," Oakley said. "They were all big-name acts and they all sang political songs you don't hear a lot of now."

Julie Fitzgerald, a member of the UMass Peacemakers, said the march was "personally inspiring and gratifying, but I don't know if it does any good."

"It's good to know we're trying to change things and we're not alone," Fitzgerald said. "This is the history of the future. There's a huge military momentum and it will take a lot of participation to turn it around."

Jackson: the man to beat?

By JOSH MEYER
Collegian Staff

Rev. Jesse Jackson's campaign manager claims "the rightness and justness" of a black presidency "is there for all to see."

"We've reached the point where America can no longer turn away from this notion of a black president," said Richard Gordon Hatcher, five-term mayor of Gary, Indiana and the chairperson for Jackson's presidential advisory committee.

Addressing a Campus Center audience last Thursday on "The Significance of Jesse Jackson's presidential candidacy to democratic politics in America," Hatcher urged that voters of all races and backgrounds seriously consider Jackson as "the man to beat Reagan" in 1984.

"Jesse Jackson has the ability to galvanize people to register and vote without even being a candidate first," said Hatcher. "Reagan could not win again if three million blacks registered."

Stressing that "Jackson has as good a chance as anyone," Hatcher spoke about Jackson's qualifications, his potential "divisive" effect on the Democratic party, and his stances on domestic and international policy.

But even more importantly he spoke about Jackson's electibility. Referring to national polls taken as late as last week, Hatcher said that Jackson is running a fairly close third, behind Walter Mondale and John Glenn.

"The nature of the American electorate is prepared to elect a candidate on the strength of the issues and their capacity to serve," he said. "People are more likely to vote against rather than for anyone-and people will have a great deal to vote against."

Campaigns are a series of local elections, not a single national one, according to Hatcher, and on the local level, "the color of a man's skin is not as important as if you can fill the potholes and other local services."

If Jackson gets a good initial start in the first two primaries, the campaign trail goes south, "where Jackson will do his best," he said.

Responding to questions about Jackson "splitting the liberal vote," Hatcher said that this "novel and unprecedented theory" is asking that blacks operate under a different set of rules than other candidates. "It's like telling someone to run, but to try not to take votes away from the other candidates," he said.

"Jackson's campaign can only strengthen the Democratic party," Hatcher said. "With eight million unregistered blacks, the Democrats can break the (Republican) majorities in the Senate and in local elections, and even the White House."

According to Hatcher, the Rev. Jackson's outspokenness and backing by a "Rainbow coalition, with a full spectrum of voters," will generate broader discussion of the issues and more honesty in the campaign."

University students double as Amherst firefighters

By ELIZABETH LUCIANO
Collegian Staff

They don't seem to have much in common.

Their hobbies range from photography to gourmet cooking, and their majors are as diverse as business and psychology.

Some are natural talkers, while others prefer to remain quiet.

There is, however, a common denominator linking these 13 young men. Together, they constitute Amherst Fire Department (AFD) Engine Company Number Three, UMass' volunteer student firefighting force.

They are not people studying firefighting, but rather, members of AFD who are also UMass students. They have emergency medical technician (EMT) certification, enabling them to operate and utilize the ambulance.

"When we go on a call, it's almost like a Dr. Jekyll-Mr. Hyde (transformation) from UMass student to Amherst firefighter," Capt. Mike Russell, a junior, said. He and Lt. Lindsay Stromgren, a sophomore, serve as the group's officers.

TEAMWORK — Four university students who are also members of the Amherst Fire Department wet down a fire at a Massachusetts Firefighting Academy drill held last week in Hopkinton.

Despite the company's rigorous training, there were more than 50 applicants during last spring's recruitment drive, only two of whom were women.

Preferred applicants are freshmen or sophomores with EMT certification and/or firefighting experience, although the most important qualifications are "enthusiasm and desire," said Russell.

Accepted applicants attend once-a-week training sessions during the end of the spring semester, by a forty-hour "wonder week" before school re-opens in September.

"We lose most of the people in the end of the spring when (they) get the idea it's not just riding on the red truck and waving to everybody. It's dirty, back-breaking work," Russell said.

Training isn't over once a new firefighter is officially a member of the force. Engine Company Three spends at least three hours a week drilling.

Recently, they have been learning how to deal with liquid petroleum gas (LPG) and liquid natural gas (LNG) fires. This is in addition to time spent maintaining the station and equipment, and responding to emergencies.

It can easily add up to 30 hours a week, although the figure varies.

"You have to be able to pre-plan your studying. You can't leave your studying until the last minute, because you might not have the last minute," Marc Gautreau, a junior, said.

Schoolwork may suffer when firefighters' beepers sound off and they must leave classes to respond to calls.

Most professors are understanding and willing to re-schedule quizzes for force members, but this is not always the case.

"I had a professor give me a hard time once," Russell recalled, "She got all upset at me for disrupting her class, and then I asked her if she lived in Amherst. She said yes, and she goes, 'Okay, you just sit in back, by the exit."

The cigarette pack-sized red beepers, usually worn on belts, are the firefighters' distinguishing marks.

"It's for my mother. When she wants me, she sets it off," joked Russell.

"It's amazing how many ways you can hide it, though," added Scott Burke, a senior.

Despite a recent rash of practical jokes, trust is strong between force members.

This is necessary not only during actual emergencies, but also during smokehouse drills, in which a cement structure is filled with fire and smoke, and the firefighters are sent in to search for a mannequin. Visibility is extremely low, and there is the chance of an air tank malfunctioning-something which has actually happened to more than one member of the force.

Nevertheless, the firefighters seem undaunted by routinely placing themselves in danger.

"You know it (firefighting) has got to be for the love of it when guys burn off their beards at drills," Craig Greengus, a sophomore said, referring to Burke.

"He (Burke) looked like Elmer Fudd after Bugs Bunny did him in," Russell added.

Despite the company's sense of humor, however, they are very much aware of the seriousness of their work.

"I don't think I worry so much about ever getting hurt as I do about not doing something right, because then somebody could get hurt. That's what worries me the most," Burke said.

Faculty Senate demands input in classroom conversions

By LAURA YEE
Collegian Staff

In an effort to have more input in the conversion of classroom space for other purposes, the University of Massachusetts Faculty Senate Thursday unanimously passed a motion requiring the administration to consult with the Senate before allocating class space.

"We do lose classroom space frequently. The faculty is deeply concerned and hardly ever consulted. We should at least get a glimpse of what happens before it comes to pass because adequate classroom space is deteriorating," said Klaus Kroner, chair of the Space and Calendar committee of the Senate.

According to the Space and Calendar Committee's report, five classrooms were removed from the University's classroom list "for other academic-related usage" this fall. "Finding other classroom space after losing these rooms was very difficult, and included assigning classes to two of the unsuitable noisy classrooms in the Graduate Research Towers," the report stated.

Samuel Conti, acting provost, spoke against the motion because "sometimes renovations need to be made, therefore, conditions are concerned but this in turn may be inhibiting renovations."

Steven Zeil, computer and information science professor, also spoke against the motion because he said the senate is not the place where decisions concerning classroom space should be made.

"Changes must be negotiated (but) I don't think it's appropriate of this policy-making body," Zeil said.

Student Government Association co-President Tom Ahern asked if the resolution would concern study space because the administration is "also taking study space and converting it for non-academic uses."

Kroner said the issue of converting study space to other things has not yet been discussed but "we will be concerned with that issue, also."

In other business, some senators expressed concern about the appearance of advertisements in the 1984 spring course scheduling booklet.

"I'm as embarassed as you are," Conti said.

Vice Chancellor for University Relations and Development Deirdre Ling said neither she nor the administration were informed of the appearance of advertisements. She said a meeting will be scheduled with Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Dennis L. Madson to discuss the purpose of the advertisements.

English professor Thomas Ashton said he felt Madson should have sent a representative to the meeting, "considering the size of the salaries involved."

WOMEN'S FORUM

Women's Forum is a weekly listing of upcoming events relating to women's issues. Notices should be sent to the Women's Issues Editors, care of the Collegian, 113 Campus Center, before the Friday preceding the event.

The University of Massachusetts defines sexual harassment as "any unwanted or inappropriate sexual attention...that can make a person uncomfortable on the job or in the academic or living environment and includes looks, leering, innuendoes, verbal abuse, and remarks about a person's clothing."

The Sexual Harassment Education Project is made up of students trying to educate other students and members of the university community about sexual harassment. For more information, contact Teri Hamlin, coordinator of the project at 323-4586.

Monday — The Anti-Racism Team will meet at 4 p.m. in room 802, Campus Center.

Tuesday — The Women's Leadership Project will sponsor, as part of a series titled "Women in Power: Alternative Forms of Leadership," a discussion called "Finding a Voice; Women of India" at 12:30 p.m. in room 178, Campus Center.

The Women's Issues Team will meet at 4 p.m. in the Dukes Room, Student Union.

Theresa Amott, visiting professor at UMass will speak on "Women's Wages and Working Conditions: What's Changed and What Needs to Change?" from 7 to 9 p.m. at the Jones Library in Amherst. The lecture is part of a three-part series on "Strategies for Survival: Changing the Role of Women in the Economy" sponsored by the Everywoman's Center.

Wednesday — The Committee for Equal Rights and Reproductive Freedom will meet at 5 p.m. in room 801, Campus Center.

Saturday — the Equity Institute is sponsoring a one-day workshop entitled "How to Stop Sexual Harassment" from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. at the Equity Institute.

Pigeons don't cause real problems

While attempting to deal with lunch at the Dining Commons Tuesday I read an article on the front page of that day's Collegian on alleged sexual harassment going on in the Student Union Building. It seems that a number of male workers in the building have been known to sit in the hallway on their lunch break and watch the women of the Student Affairs Office walk by, among others. According to one of the women they "watch you as you walk up to them and then after you walk away." Several of the women concurred and one added that some of the men not only look at the women but sometimes whistle or make remarks as well.

Walter Branson

After wondering why these men are not doing 10-20 years in Sing-Sing for first degree eye undressing. I decided to do a little investigation on my own. I went to the Student Activities Office and talked to three of the women employees. Sure enough, they told me, the male workers were accustomed to taking their breaks outside the Barber Shop. From this vantage point the men would watch the SAO women as they walked down the hall, sometimes making comments to them. I asked if any of the women had ever approached these men and let them know that they found their behavior annoying. None of the women had, nor did they know of any others who did. One of the women thought that one of the men in the Building Operations Office might have said something to the workers, but she wasn't sure. The women also told me that the Everywomen's Center had been pressing them to take action against the men. Next I took a walk towards the Campus Center. Upon approaching the area in question, the radiator outside the Barber Shop, I noticed there were no male workers in evidence. I sat on the radiator. Looking straight ahead I found it impossible not to see everyone coming down the hall towards me. My eyes fell on females and males alike, but they didn't seem to notice. I thought that perhaps one needs to be a middle-aged, beer-bellied construction worker in order to be a sexual harasser. I next went to the Building Operations Office where I talked to Director Forrest Davies. Mr. Davies told me that several of the men had approached him upon reading the Collegian article and expressed their surprise that their behavior had been bothersome to the women. No one had ever told them this before. One of the workers stated that he had made remarks to some of the women, but only because he knew them personally. The workers promised not to do this in the future if the women were bothered by it.

It appears that this is a clear-cut example of what is known as "making a mountain out of a molehill." In other words, this is not front page Collegian stuff. Now I am not defending these men, but at worst what is involved here is mildly annoying behavior on their part and perhaps poor judgement. The label sexual harassment is clearly out of line in this case, whatever the University's definition may be. The problem is a minor intrapersonal problem that should have been handled on an intrapersonal level. The fact that the women in the SAO Office failed to address the problem properly is not to their credit. The fact that the Everywomen's Center has chosen to waste its time on an incident of no importance is not to its credit.

Sexual harassment is a real and important issue in our society. The misappropriation of that label to a petty quarrel such as this can only serve to make us question the reality of serious incidences of harassment. My advice to anyone who may be involved in such a minor dispute is that before you start the accusations, name-calling, and petitions, try and effect a peaceful resolution of the problem so that we don't have to spend our lunch hours reading about this again.

What am I doing here?

It's so hot. I never felt this kind of heat before. It's unbearable. I keep thinking about how I'd be going skiing soon if I were back home. Sweat pours down my body as if I were enveloped by a stream. The filth and scum stick to me like a second skin. It feels like I'm covered by something that I'm never going to be able to get off.

Great uniform I have. I'm God knows where in a place where the temperature is over 100 degrees every day and they give me a winter uniform! I can't even take my shirt off. If I do I'll get sunstroke. It seems like it's been so long since I've worn real clothes but it's only been about a month. This helmet sucks. I feel like I'm wearing a frying pan on my head. My head is getting fried. I can't take it off though, I might get wasted. You can never tell when the firing is going to start again.

Gail E. Argentine

I've been here for two weeks, me and anyone that's left that is. The food is running out, we're down to one meal a day. Listen to me calling it a meal – half a can of C-rations. The water is almost gone and what's left we can barely drink because of all the crap that got in it. Not one canteen is more than one third full. Without reinforcements it might, no, it will be over for all of us by the end of the week.

When the sun goes down the temperature drops to near freezing. At night we all huddle together to try to conserve body heat. None of us have blankets. When the wind kicks up it feels like it's piercing through my body like a sharp blade. Slowly we're dying from the temperature variation between night and day. None of us are anywhere near full strength.

I can't sleep. It's impossible. I'm constantly gripped by the fear that the enemy will launch a surprise attack. If they ever snuck up on us we'd get wiped out. We wouldn't stand a chance.

None of those bastards in Washington can imagine what it's like to sleep with dead bodies, the bodies of their friends. They don't have to go through each day watching their buddies dropping all around them from wounds or sickness.

If they only knew what it was like to live in rat-infested holes, drink polluted water, and eat rancid or bug-infested food. They sit at their big desks and decide who will be the next to come over here. Every night they see their families and feel safe in their homes. None of us, not one, will ever have that feeling of security again and they take it for granted. We'll never be happy again because we're not going to get out of here alive. We're all trying to hide it but sometimes we can't help crying when we think about how soon we're going to lose everything. I keep wondering if I'll be next. How much do they expect me to take?!

I wonder what it would be like to die. Soon it'll be over and I won't have to think about it anymore. There's no way around it unless a miracle decides to drop in our laps and save us.

I don't even know what the hell I'm fighting for. A piece of land isn't worth all of this suffering. I'm going to die in this godforesaken wasteland and I won't even know why. But by my life I damn all those who started this war to burn in Hell! If I ever get ho.....

Graffitists: clean up your act

To the Editor:

On Thursday, November 10th, many of you may have been 'lucky' enough to see the red/green grafitti, such as "Grenada Cries," and "U.S. out of the world", spraypainted on the sides of university facilities. If you were as outraged as I, you need read no further. I am addressing this to the perpetrators and supporters of this act.

I will not argue your right to free speech, nor your political views, whether I agree or disagree with them. However, I assume that you, just as I, do not want University fees hiked. By your wanton, malicious, criminal (destruction of public and private property) act, you, and others like you, succeed in bringing about what you are against.

You have required the Physical Plant to sandblast the damaged buildings and flagpoles, not only raising expenses, but also damaging the beauty (at least as I see it) of our buildings. You also damage your cause by showing that you care less about others and more about your own 'important' views, no matter the consequences.

So please, in the future, restrain yourselves when the urge arises. Use the more conventional and intelligent methods of postering and petitioning, and save your money to aid your cause. You will gain more respect from others for your plea, and your restraint will be greatly appreciated by all.

In a land without values

To the Editor,

From the perspective of an infrequent visitor to the college classroom scene, there seems evident the unmistakable stench of academic cowardice. As a graduate of the University in 1973, part of a generation too frequently labelled and dismissed, it seems saddening to see the relative scarcity of intellectual ferment on campuses.

The crucial issues have generally not been rectified yet it seems a myopia spawned of materialism has dulled the consciousness of too many of the young -and their faculty. The quest for the American Dream, in all its deadening, piggish splendor has caused far too many individuals to abandon that which makes us most truly human -our consciences, our capacity for compassion and empathy, the ability to reason - and to doubt.

A land without values, one which neglects the call to urgent and necessary change, is a wasteland. Is this what higher education, in its fullest and most noble aspects, prepares the human being to conform to?

Swatting flies with bazookas

To the Editor,

All the rhetoric concerning Grenada is spewing out. President Reagan ascertains the "rescue mission" is a success. With a glint in his eye and a smile of pride, he alludes to the heroism of our boys who fought bravely, some making the "supreme sacrifice."

He tells us of the "big picture." He explains how in this world that sits on a nuclear tinderbox, that is bombarded by pollution, that is in a state of starvation, drought and despair in undeveloped nations, 6,000 armed men in the act of shelling and shooting their way through a tiny island somehow help bring peace and stability.

We fall for it. We small, nameless Americans can feel a bit prouder now that America has flexed its muscles and proven itself to be no "paper tiger." We can sweep aside the fact that we bombed a mental hospital on Grenada, killing at least 17 patients, an act that in any context but war would be regarded as the most despicable of crimes. We should be ashamed.

We must realize that every gun brought to bear on a target, every explosion of every bomb is not justice or a rescue, it is terror. It is the saddest testament of our times that our technology and intellectual development is so advanced, but we can not nearly reason with each other out of mutual respect, affection and trust.

If we take pride in our crushing of Grenada, we are conspirators in the crime. Beneath the political hype and partiotic hyperbole now bantered about, beneath the smoke of fancy phrases, lie the maimed and burned and dead-war's true beneficiaries. Does the fact that only a small "acceptable" number died on Grenada justify anything?

Our crushing of Grenada was like the swatting of a fly whose buzzing annoyed us. But they were people we swatted, and slaughtered.

Jorma's hot, Bobby's not

HOT TUNA & BOBBY AND THE MIDNIGHTS
Thursday, November 3
Springfield Civic Center
Little Arena

By PETER WISSOKER
Collegian Staff

Of the bands on revival tours, how many are turning out really new and exciting music that makes you remember why you respected them in the first place? Well let's just say you can count them on one hand. Sure, the David Bowie tour was good, and I'm sure the Band reunion was good too. But when I left the Hot Tuna show I felt like I had really learned something new about music; that I could view rock & roll from a new perspective.

Although the concert was short, lead guitarist Jorma Kaukonen, who is clearly the real force behind the reformed Hot Tuna, led the band through "Rock Me Baby", "I See the Light", "Junkie on Angel Dust" and four new songs. For people who were expecting the pre-1973 semi-acoustic Hot Tuna, a surprise was due; for people who had heard post-1973 stuff, the concert was a watershed.

The new Hot Tuna style revolves around bassist Jack Casady and drummer Shegeni Komiyama keeping a really steady backbeat, second guitarist Mike Falzarano playing rhythm and Jorma playing lots of heavily distorted chords and some leads on top. It sounds really good. Surprising the austere rhythm section provides a beat that is actually stronger than even the new Talking Heads.

Whereas the show at the Agora two weeks ago sounded like an electric Jorma show, this show displayed a more unified concept. Jack was moving around the stage alot more and although he isn't the same as he was a few years ago, the austere approach does work and even though he doesn't fill in the spaces like he used to, once you get used to it you realize that it's inherent anyway.

As for the Bob concert, that was almost pathetic. The first time I saw Bobby and the Midnights was in 1980. Guitarist Bobby Cochran and Bob (The Bob, Bob Weir of the Grateful Dead) both ran around the stage while Cochran played lots of loud solos; it was kind of commercial but it was rock and roll and it was really fun. This year is a different story. Except for the very end of the concert Weir hardly moved around. There were only about three real solos during the whole set. Cochran never really reacted when he'd play; instead we were treated to saxaphones. Hey, Bob's OK, if you like saxaphones.

A few songs were pretty good. "Supplication" is always great to hear and Bob's solo was really good. "Josephine" started out terribly and eventually ended up pretty good. On the whole I would say that the new Bob affair can be summarized by three points. 1) Billy Cobham who at the beginning of the bands' history played a lot has been reduced to a position similar to that Carl Palmer is Asia. Boom-Chick-chick. 2) At the end of the concert Weir moved to center stage and started his patented scream at the end of "Book of Rules". My personal feeling is that this is what Bob really wants and what he should have. Screaming Bob in front of screaming guitars. With Bob center stage. 3) This particular Bob show seemed like a tired recitation of songs that once were fun but now were boring. There was a big zero to be learned here. At least it provided a contrast.

Bob Weir — a new concept, complete with saxophones.

The Bard meets Marvel

By DAVID TAYLOR
Collegian Correspondent

It would be easy to cry "sacrilege" and condemn this book as a desecration of a work of art. Shakespeare has long been a revered artist and one of the 'untouchables.' But surely any medium that makes such a universally accepted work of art more accessible to the general reader, particularly in the younger age group, should be encouraged rather than put down.

Romeo and Juliet is a brightly colored comic-book rendition of the faithful old classic romance. The scenes are all there in glorious technicolor — what the artist, Von, has done is merely translated the visual in the text into a form that is easier to relate to.

As always in Shakespeare the visual cues in the original are at best difficult to keep in mind, and Von has done well in giving the stage directions life in the cartoons. The text is complete and unabridged — and here is the main problem in the concept of the book. I had great difficulty, not in seeing what was happening, but in understanding what was being said. The spatial organization of the speech bubbles is a little confused, and it is sometimes hard to order the dialogue.

Generally the layout in the book is excellent. The whole book has as much rhythm and orchestration as the best stage productions and the visual selectivity within the picture frames is concise and effective. This selectivity ranges from the close-up of a love-struck eye to a huge double page spread for "Oh swear not by the moon." Von's charactizations are clear and believable and, just as his earlier cartoon Macbeth bristled with violence, Romeo and Juliet oozes coy sensuality.

If this version of the play fails for me at all, it is because the text itself was unable to hold my attention. I was not driven to my copy of The Riverside Shakespeare but more to sit back, follow the story in the pictures, and revel in the artwork. Von's Macbeth is now used in British schools to teach Shakespeare, and has proved successful in creating interest in the bard at high school level.

Romeo and Juliet in this version could be used for the same purpose since it is slick and visually engaging, and, whilst not replacing a good theater performance in any way, allows the person who is not enamoured with wading through 70 pages of close-packed blank verse to find a way in to one of the great dramas of the English language.

Stoltzman shows versatility

Richard Stoltzman, clarinet with Irma Vallecillo, piano and Salvatore Macchia, bass
Buckley Recital Hall,
Amherst College

By TONY SCILIPOTI
Collegian Correspondent

It is much more difficult to write a good review than a bad one; it's more difficult to describe why a performance was exhilarating than why it was disappointing. The constituent factors which combine to make a recital outstanding as clarinettist Richard Stoltzman's was Tuesday night, do not glare out individually at the audience as do, say, poor intonation or missed notes in a bad concert. A performer must have a relaxed demeanor, an ability to engage his audience and make its members feel comfortable — instead of standing up to play his first piece, an unaccompanied solo, Stoltzman pulled the piano bench to the edge of the stage and sat down on the end of it — if his recital is to be successful. More important, though, is the music itself, and Richard Stoltzman has such awesome technical command of the clarinet that, like Heifetz and Segovia, he plays music as though his instrument weren't even there. His interpretations, however unorthodox, are presented with such conviction and beauty that one cannot help but hear them as definitive. When he moves from one register to another on his instrument, he is like a cat leaping onto the top of a fence.

The first piece on the program, Bach's Chromatic Fantasy in D Minor, was originally written for harpsichord (there were no clarinets worthy of the name before Mozart's time, fifty years later). The harpsichord is very unlike the clarinet: It's dynamic range is extremely limited, and the duration of any one note is pre-fixed. Dispatching with aplomb the substantial technical problems involved (in writing for keyboard, Bach didn't take into account the difficulties of leaping furiously among octaves on the clarinet, nor, this being a chromatic fantasy, the extreme awkwardness of certain keys), Stoltzman rebuffed the authenticity buffs by playing the piece as his instrument naturally dictates — almost as a romantic-period fantasy — with complete cogency.

In the second part of the first half of the concert, Ms. Vallecillo accompanied the soloist in the long Bb clarinet sonata of Max Reger (1873-1916). The balance of volume the two achieved was impressive; neither drowned out the other, each quieted a little for the other's lead-passages. It is not easy to accompany well, and Ms. Vallecillo probably receives less credit for Mr. Stoltzman's fame than she deserves. The moments of dark lyricism cut short by violence in the piece are very reminiscent of the Brahms clarinet-like passages, but on the whole the piece is a bit too long and a bit too predictable.

Toward the end of intermission, with everyone talking in the aisles, Mr. Stoltzman appeared at the back of the house, playing W. T. McKinley's fanfaresque "Entrata, No. 2." He strolled down toward the stage while the audience was being seated, before disappearing through the stage door playing the piece's last note. He and Ms. Vallecillo then returned for the second-ever performance of Joan Tower's percussive, puckish, and sometimes ethereal Fantasy, and Francis Poulenc's Sonata for Clarinet and Piano (1962). This latter piece, a staple of the clarinet repertory, combines a certain classicism — in the first movement are very clear melodic references to the main theme in the first movement of Beethoven's piano sonata "Appassionata" — with very much twentieth-century French ideas: the oriental flavor of Jolivet's clarinet piece, "Meditation," in the second movement, and the wild dance steps of Milhaud's Le Creation du Monde in the third.

The last item on the program featured Stoltzman playing two pieces — "Round Midnight," and "Well, You Needn't" by the recently deceased jazz great Thelonius Monk — with bassist Macchia. Plainly, the clarinettist is as at home with this idiom, is as familiar with its conventions, as he is with "classical" music. As he explained in a feature N.Y. Times Magazine article last summer, he started out playing jazz, and it shows.

For the encores which an enthusiastic Buckley audience demanded, Mr. Stoltzman and company continued in the black-music tradition, playing Bill Douglas's "Bee-bop Etude No. 2" (with a gratuitous and, I thought, rather tacky imitation of a drum solo by Stoltzman and his accompanist), and a particularly moving and soulful improvisation on "Amazing Grace." In two words, that's just what Richard Stoltzman shows: an amazing grace.

Hypercurricula

"Hypercurricula," a listing of events held at the University of Massachusetts and surrounding area, is published daily in the Collegian. Events are listed the day before they take place except Monday which will carry Monday's and Tuesday's events. Friday will carry Saturday and Sunday.

"Hypercurricula" notices not submitted on the standard form and not submitted by the Friday before the week the event will not be run. Due to space limitations, the Collegian cannot guarantee printing of all "Hypercurricula" notices. Priority will be given to UMass organizations.

Why Frye?
How can boots that look this good, this much in style, be over a hundred years old? They're Frye Boots. Benchcrafted by skilled hands the same way since 1863. So while the styles may change the quality will remain the same. The best.

CRUNCH BUNCH — UNH's Andre Garron is stopped here by UMass in Saturday's 35-10 loss in Durham. There were times he wasn't stopped.

Papoutsidis' second punt of the quarter gave the Wildcats the ball at the UMass 37. UNH drove to the five where the Minutemen defense rose to the occasion and stopped UNH on a fourth and one.

However, UMass was forced to punt and the Wildcats started their possession needing only 31 yards for a touchdown. They traveled those yards in two plays, the first one being a Leclerc pass to O'Donnell at the one. A Mark Nichols plunge gave UNH a 14-3 lead.

Taking the kickoff, UMass was forced to punt from their own 28. This time Papoutsidis' punt landed at the 24, a loss of four yards. In all fairness to Papoutsidis, he is the field goal kicker, the fourth UMass punter this year, and he was punting under horrendous conditions — near his own goal line, in freezing conditions, and into a gusting 40 mph wind.

UNH once again took advantage of their field possession and Garron scored from three yards out as the fourth quarter was beginning.

UMass was now trailing 21-3 but things got worse as UMass quarterback Barrett McGrath was intercepted at his own thirteen and Garron converted the turnover into his second touchdown of the game.

The Minutemen finally scored a touchdown and UNH added another seven as time was running out to account for the final 35-10 tally.

For UNH, it was their sixth straight victory, the first time their offense has scored a touchdown against the Minutemen since 1978, and their first victory against the Minutemen since 1976.

For UMass (3-7), it marks the first time they have had seven losses in 15 years and it puts a negative exclamation point on their uneven season.

Minutemen booters play well but fall to Hartwick

By MIKE LEVINE
Collegian Staff

"The ball just didn't go our way."

Very few quotes can characterize the 1983 men's soccer season like that one by junior goalkeeper Donald Donahue following the UMass soccoer team's 3-1 loss to Hartwick College on Saturday at Boyden. The loss gives the Minutemen a final record of 3-12-4, while Hartwick, current-ranked fourteenth in the nation, raises its record to 13-3-1.

The Minutemen opened the scoring at the 13:15 mark of the first half when senior forward Kayvan Khatami lofted a high floater that was misplayed by goalie Mike Harrison. Fritz Pike (who brought a contingent of fans from his hometown of Greenfield, MA to the game) then fed the ball to freshman Paul Serafino, who fired it home to give UMass an early 1-0 lead.

Seven minutes later, Hartwick tied it up when Lowuis Gonzales fired a shot that was saved by UMass goaltender Jamie Firmage, but Hartwick's Paul Cushion fed the rebound to Pat Cruickshank, who converted the shot to tie the game at 1-1.

Later in the first half, the Minutemen almost regained the lead when Simon Ostrov sent Pike on a partial breakaway that was shot just wide of the goal.

At the 21:38 mark of the second half, Hartwick took the lead when Cruickshank threaded the needle with a pass to Cushion, who put the ball past Firmage for a 2-1 lead.

Then with five and a half minutes left in the game, Hartwick put the game out of reach when Firmage came out of the net to stop a shot by Dave Magistrale, but Greg Brown put the loose ball past an airborne Kevin Flynn to make the final score 3-1.

This game marked the last intercollegiate game for ten seniors — forwards John Brigham, Kayvan Khatami, and Fritz Pike, midfielders Kevin Flynn, Steve Berlin, and Simon Ostrov, and fullbacks Mike Mahoney, Frank Neffinger, Lenn Margolis, and Herb Sidman. Obviously, a 3-12-5 season was not what they were hoping for, but if the returning players play up to form next year and coach Jeff Gettler can bring in some good new players, who knows what can happen in 1984.

Final Four Fever arrives here at UMass

Women's soccer on it's way to Florida via a 1-0 victory

By ELLEN RICHARD
Collegian Staff

Who said dreams are for those who sleep? The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team certainly was not sleep-walking when it beat out Brown University 1-0 in the quarterfinals of the NCAA tournament and took a giant step toward the dream of being National Champions.

Despite a few close calls for UMass in the scoring department, the ball just would not go in. On the one shot that had 'save' labelled all over it, the ball slipped out of the Brown goaltender's possession and found its way into the net for the lone UMass score.

"Going into the final four is a dream and it's impossible and we're going to try and make it come true," an elated Coach Kalekeni Banda said.

"We had our chances and Brown had their chances, too. The bottom line is we were lucky. It could've gone either way. This was a tougher game then the ones coming up. I think Lady Luck was on our side today."

The Minutewomen had never gotten past the quarterfinals before and will travel to the University of Central Florida to face off against North Carolina on Saturday in the semi-finals and possibly go to the finals on Sunday. North Carolina defeated the University of California at Berkley 5-2 Saturday.

Debbie Harackiewicz scored the goal which is sending the Minutewomen to Florida in quest of their impossible dream 4:12 into the second half. As Stacey Flionis fled down the field with the ball while beating a Brown defender, she crossed to Harackiewicz who was stationed in front with her back to the net.

Without hesitating, Harackiewicz turned and fired the ball at Brown goaltender, Alex Smith. Smith dove for the ball and stopped it but could not hold on to it. The ball popped up and rolled over the shoulders of the helpless goaltender.

"Debbie is a true competitor," Banda said. "If there was anyone you'd want to have in the situation today you'd want to have a Debbie Harackiewicz. I have to give Debbie credit for taking the shot. That's exactly what we've been working on in practice this week."

Luck was on the Minutewomen's side with the goal that should not have been, but with six minutes left in the first half Harackiewicz was robbed of a goal that should have been. The sophomore forward caught a Michelle Rodney rebound and sent it toward the center of the net. With Smith down, a Brown defender caught it. Most of the ball was in the net but an inch of it on the white line, so no goal.

Brown had nine shots on "nervous" goaltender Jeanne Paul but the freshman stood tall and was in the way of every chance that Brown had to put the ball in the net.

"She didn't want to lose that ball," Banda said of Paul. "It's tough to ask a freshman to play in goal in a game like this. I think Jeanne has been tooth and nail but I won't hesitate to put Lisa (Ellis) in if I have to. She's (Paul) a freshman and I say she made herself look really good today."

Brown gave the hardworking Minutewomen a tough fight but UMass proved it deserved to win. Now UMass has the chance to show the powerhouse teams in the playoffs that this team is for real.

"Now we're playing to win," Banda said. "We have to attack more and force the issue. We'll hang in there. There are no superstars here; we're a blue-collar team."

A lot depends on goalie

By GERRY deSIMAS

They are the last line of defense. In some games, you never notice them. In others, they can save a team or break them. And it's tougher when it's cold out, like in UMass' 1-0 win over Brown Sunday.

The cold and the nine shots the Bruins presented to UMass goalie Jeanne Paul didn't trouble her too much. Oh, she missed one corner that created a scramble infront that the Minutewomen defense cleared. But, all in all, the freshman held her own.

"I had a lot of support," said Paul. "The defense was awesome."

On the other hand, Brown's Alex Smith did not have such sure hands yesterday. She bobbled at least three balls in the first half and she made the biggest bobble of all when she let Debbie Harackiewicz's shot to get by her.

"She went down too early," Phil Pincincre, Brown head coach said. "She already had the angle cut down." Paul thought that her gloves the Bruin senior captain had on had something to do with it.

"I don't like using gloves. You can never tell for sure if the ball is in your hands."

Harackiewicz was a very surprised but grateful recipient of the Brown blunder. "I think I caught her off guard. Banda (UMass coach Kalekeni) told me to play with my back to her. I turned around to shoot and I guess she lost her concentration.

"It was a goal and that's what counts."

For Smith, the goal was one that nightmares are made of but Brown with it's 15 freshmen should be back next year.

The Minutewomen, meantime, continue on to Saturday's match with 16-1 North Carolina and if UMass wins it's either UConn or George Mason for the National title.

Brown goes home and wonders what could have been.

Football team hammered by the wind and UNH, 35-10

By KEVIN DELUCA
Collegian Staff

Despite having history on their side, the dismal season of the University of Massachusetts Minutemen continued this past Saturday as they traveled to the University of New Hampshire for their final Yankee Conference game and were blown away by the Wildcats and the wind, in Durham, 35-10.

This was a game that only the mothers of the players could find exciting as the UMass offense could not be found most of the game and the UNH offense consisted of tailback Andre Garron carrying the ball 35 times for only 129 yards — an unimpressive 3.7 yards a carry. UNH would not have gotten near 35 points if three of their drives had not started at the UMass 31, 24, and 13 yard lines.

The game began with much more promise than it ended as UNH quarterback Rick Leclerc drove his team 80 yards for a game-opening touchdown and then UMass immediately countered with a drive of its own which resulted in a 28-yard field goal by George Papoutsidis. The 7-3 score would hold up for the rest of the half.

The Minutemen started the second half facing a wind that reached 40 mph and this would be their undoing.

Field hockey tops Temple 3-1 for another trip to Penn.

By MICHELLE DOLAN
Collegian Staff

PHILADELPHIA — The NCAA field hockey tournament is demanding competition. The University of Massachusetts has the capacity to deliver under this kind of pressure.

Sunday at the University of Pennsylvania, Temple, who had toppled UPenn 1-0 on Saturday, challenged UMass in the quarter-finals. Massachusetts outlasted the Owls 3-1 to earn their second trip to the Final Four in three years.

Massachusetts, who now own a 14-2-2 record, came out fired up on both offense and defense. Temple did too and it took a Megan Donnelly save to break up the initial Owl drive.

Senior goalie Patty Shea was dynamic in goal, coming out of the cage numerous times to make the save.

The first half was one of UMass offensive pressure. Pam Moyrl and Chris Kocot both drove into the circle before the Temple defense broke up their drives.

Massachusetts broke out on top at 17:44 of the first half as Donnelly drove a shot by Temple goalie Robin Porter, the US team goalie. Patti Smith assisted on the goal that gave UMass the 1-0 lead.

The Minutewomen defense played well, led by midfielder Lil Hultin, whose job was to mark Temple's lead leading scorer, Caroline McWilliams, a senior from Ireland.

However, Temple evened up the game sweeping the ball past Shea with 6:27 to go in the opening half.

After the Temple comeback goal, the Owls were forced back on defense as Massachusetts kept the ball on attack.

During the half, UMass went to the bench for their halftime meeting while Temple retreated to a goalie cage on the artificial turf at UPenn. Massachusetts cheered "score and win" and went out again more fired up but this time knowing of the challenge, more knowing of Temple.

In the second half, UMass again controlled offensively and when Temple did get the ball, UMass marked tight.

With 11:48 to go in the contest, and after numerous Minutewomen penetrations, the UMass persistance finally paid off. Donnelly scored off a corner, with assists from Packard and back Carol Progulske, on a strong drive that went by Porter into the corner of the cage and the 2-1 edge.

With a scant two minutes to go in the game, Temple was fighting to gain any offensive edge but UMass continued to apply pressure. UMass clinched the win when Patti Smith sent another shot by Porter with 47 seconds to go for the 3-1 edge.

When asked for a comment on the game, UMass head coach Pam Hixon said "Ecstatic!" The scoring pattern also forced even greater pressure on the teams.

"It's always good to go ahead. We made Temple come at us." The fine UMass effort was even greater considering that UMass played with bothersome injuries.

"Megan and Sue Packard both played injured," said Hixon. "Both gave everything they had for the cause. That's something that is really inspiring."

UMass will travel back to UPenn on Friday for the semi-finals, probably against second seed Old Dominion.

With the UM victory over injuries and pressure, they deserve to be ecstatic.

March On Washington

U.S. Out of Central America and the Caribbean!

by Aiko Pandorf and Brenda Ling

November 12th Coalition

On Saturday, November 12th at the March on Washington, an estimated 50,000 people voiced their opposition to U.S. policy of intervention in Central America and the Caribbean. At 10 a.m. three rallies formed to focus on U.S. military build-up, support of Central Amerrican refugees, and the human effects of U.S. policy of intervention.

Although the November 12th Mobilization had been planned prior to the October 23rd bombing of marine headquarters in Beirut and the October 25th invasion of Grenada, a tone of urgency was added in light of President Reagan's recent committment to his militaristic foreign policy.

Several national organizations and individuals dedicated to the struggle of the peoples of Central American and the Caribbean joined together to form a national network of November 12th coalitions. Among the endorsers were the Committee in Solitartiy with the People of El Salvador (CISPES), the Committee in Solidarity with Free Grenada and the National Network in Solidarity with the People of Nicaragua, as well as the Progressive Student Network and Mel King.

The local Northampton Committee on Central America (NCOCA), Western Massachusettts Latin American Solidarity Committee (WMLASC), American Friends Service Committee (AFSC), Amherst U.S.-Grenada Friendship Society, and Venceremos Brigade, helped to educate area residents on the issues and organized transportation for the 200 who attended the March.

Last week Laurie Bozzi from WMLASC expresed enthusiam over the positive campus and community response to the issues of the March. She had said that without a strong protest "it will seem like a go ahead to other things in the face of Grenada and Nicaragua." She referred to the growing concern over U.S. intervention, and this was well demonstrated by the numbers of buses, vans and private cars that left the area on Friday night to travel to the demonstration.

March and Rally in Washington

The rally at the State House was the largest of the three rallies which took part in the March on Washington. The main theme was the effect of U.S. foreign policy on peoples' lives in Central America and the Caribbean.

Busloads of protestors arrived with banners and posters that read "Our sons will not die for Reagan's ruling class interests," "I'd rather pay more for bananas than kill the people who grow them." "Stop Gunboat Diplomacy," "Jobs and Peace, not Guns and War," "Nobody's Backyard."

With caricatures of Weinberger, Kirkpatrick, and Kissinger looming overhead, a mock graveyard of cards symbolizing tombstones of persons killed in Central America called to mind the thousands of dead from revolutionary struggles for freedom and justice against U.S. supported regimes.

An emergency campaign, "Fuel the friendship with the Nicaraguan people," urged protestors to bring quarts of motor oil to help replace what CIA-directed counterrevolutionaries destroyed in the October 10th attack on the port of Corinto. Demonstrators presented their quarts of oil to a Nicaraguan medical student who will deliver them to Nicaragua.

A short program of cultural performers and speakers followed. Speakers denounced Reagan's current foreign policies. Marguerita Samat-Matias, Director of New York City College's Latin American Studies Department said, "His defense is a greater threat to us than the enemy." Others outlined that Central Americans will not let up in their struggle for self-determination, regardless of the extent of U.S. intervention. Supporters' hope and dedication were expressed in their sign slogans of "You can kill the revolutionary, but not the revolution," "The world is not convinced of U.S. superiority," and "Long live people's struggle everywhere."

These thoughts fed the march from the State House to the main rally site at the Ellipse outside the White House. Along the 4-mile route various pro-intervention supporters expressed their views. Groups of veterans marched by proudly in a regimented step, wearing military dress or fatigues, and all carrying American flags. Other veterans stood atop vans to jeer at and to give the finger to passing demonstrators. Further along the route, a group of Reverend Moon's Unification Church members carried signs and suggested that ralliers were "Pinko Liberals" and were promoting "Marxist genocide."

Nevertheless, the march filed on with positive energy and with no violent confrontation to join the other two rally groups for the final gathering at the Ellipse.

During the main rally at the Ellipse various speakers and performers drew together the three contingents. The music group, Peter, Paul and Mary opened the program with a song inspired by Mary's recent trip to El Salvador. Dave Clark, of Washington's City Council, then officially welcomed the November 12th Coalition and emphasised that "the people of Washington are for peace, too."

Sixties activist Revered William Sloane Coffin called upon the government to"stop the lies and violence,"stating that "lies lead to violence, and violence leads to lies to justify its use." Referring to Reagan's statements linking the roots of the revolution in El Salvador to Soviet "foreign soil," he stressed that the revolution in El Salvador is popularly based.

Congressional Representative Ted White said that "President Reagan's recent military manuvers in Grenada and Lebanon are immoral, unconstitutional and illegal, and he deserves to be impeached for it." He announced the November 10th House Resolution no. 370 sponsored by eight Congressional representatives that initiates an impeachment campaign against President Reagan.

Leslie Cagan, of the National Mobilization for Survival, expressed her personal fright, anger and sadness of U.S. military intervention. "I am sorry, Mr. President, the people of Nicaragua, El Salvador and the Soviet Union are not our enemy." She spoke of foreign opposition to U.S. intervention policies and said that it is not too late to stop the military intervention. Cagan stated, "Tomorrow belongs to the people of the world, but we must act decisively if we are to see tomorrow."

Ronnie Gilbert, with Holly Near, Grupo Raiz and Bernice Reagon, gave short performances, adding a moving spirit and warming the crowd that was frozen by the winds and 35-degree weather. Particularly inspirational was Reagon's prompting the crowd to join hands and voices for a chorus of "Down By the Riverside."

Featured speaker Jesse Jackson drew the crowd's attention as he strongly denounced President Reagan and demanded "a new course, a new coalition and a new leadership." Jackson urged the crowd to join his Rainbow Coalition and described the Coalition as having the "power to change the course of American politics." Jackson spoke emphatically, received rounds of applause and evoked confidence from many ralliers.

More than once, though, Jackson's theatricism showed through as he stumbled over contradictions in his own speeach.

After intiailly stating the need for "a peace-keeping force" in Lebanon and receiving loud boos from the crowd, Jackson suddenly spoke of the immediate need to "bring the boys home."

Jackson also alienated some participants by referring to his Rainbow Coalition as consisting of Blacksand Hispanics, and never acknowledging other constituencies that may support him.

Moreover, he capped off his stirring oratory by restating his committment to women. In the end he overstated his goal of empowering women when he named Golda Meir and Margaret Thatcher as models of political women. Jackson's assumption that Meir and Thatcher embody all women's politics or active political potential outlines not only his tokenism but his misunderstanding of American women's development over the past 20 years. Participants expresseed their disapproval of Jackson's statement with loud boos and hisses.

Nevertheless, demonstrators left the rally with positive feelings and future dedication . Some UMass students summed up their opinions of the day: Kim Curtis "was impressed at the diversity of groups there and excited by that. That legion of vets giving us the finger reminded me that the state represents the strongest military force." She therefore realized the tremendous task ahead for supporters of non-intervention. Fred Corn was impressed by the crowds that had "lots of spirit (with) good chanting." Rom Coles thought the demonstration "was well-organized, that the spirit was good."

Overall, the November 12th Mobilization was a positive statement about American people's objection to growing intervention in Central America and the Caribbean. The strong show of support helped all participants to see that no one is alone in demandiong U.S. OUT! And as Jackson had earlier recognized the day's spirit, he urged the demonstrators, "let us not give up, we are together now, help is on the way."

Mayor Richard Hatcher speaks on Jesse Jackson's Candidacy

by Russell Jordan
Nummo Contributor

Richard Hatcher, Mayor of Gary, Indiana, spoke at the Campus Center Thursday about the significance of Jesse Jackson's candidacy for the Democratic Presidential nomination.

Hatcher refuted several of the arguments raised against Jackson's candidacy. Many Democratic Party officials and several Black leaders have criticized Jackson's candidacy on the basis that it would have an adverse effect on the Democratic Party.

"I find this argument difficult to accept," said Hatcher. "I don't believe the entry of Jackson will do harm or create division in the Democratic Party; on the contrary, I think it will strengthen it. Jesse Jackson will bring new voters into the party; he has the ability to galvinize people and cause them to register to vote. A Jackson candidacy may in fact help Democrats gain control of the Senate."

Hatcher also addressed himself to the belief that Blacks will be demoralized if Jackson fails to gain the nomination, and this in turn many discourage Blacks from voting in the general election. Said Hatcher, "A people who have survived slave ships, slavery, reconstruction, segregation and racism will not throw their hands up in despair if Jesse does not gain the nomination. It is an insult to the intelligence of Black people in this country to think so. If he loses, we will continue to fight and struggle. Black people won't opt out of the political process if Jesse doesn't win the nomination."

Hatcher indicated that Jackson is currently ranked third in the polls of Democratic candidates behind Walter Mondale and John Glenn. "Jackson will do well in the primaries in the South and Midwest.

If Jackson can bring together his Rainbow Coalition he will go into the convention with a significant number of delegates."

Hatcher said Jackson's most potent effect may be on local political offices. He believes Jackson's candidacy may inspire Blacks, Hispanics and women to run for local political offices, thus reshaping America politically from the grassroots up.

Hatcher said that Jesse Jackson has received several "vicious death threats," and as a result he is already receiving Secret Service protectioon. "This is testament to the man's courage," said Hatcher.

"Every political office should be open to all, based on qualifications and regardless of race, creed, color or sex," said Hathcer.

Upward Bound

by Donette Wilson and
Segun Eubanks
Nummo Staff

Many studies have shown that urban public schools have not sufficiently prepared young minority and low-income students for post-secondary education.

When a student begins to do poorly or to show low motivation toward his or her education the student is often ignored and discourgaged or even rejected by the school system.

For students who have the potential to excel but who have never been given the opportunity or encouragement, there is a place for them to turn to for help. Upward Bound is a federally-funded college-preparatory program designed to provide positive motivation and an extra push for low-income or first-generation students, those whose parents do not have college degrees.

There are over 440 Upward Bound programs nationwide and one of the most renowned is UMass/Amherst's Upward Bound (UB) program in the New Africa House.

Charles Bohdi has been the Director of the Amherst program for four years and Assistant Director Bryant "Mr. B" Lewis started at UB as a summer counselor nine years ago.

Upward Bound developed out of the Great Society programs of Lyndon Johnson in the mid-1960's. Amherst UB was first funded in 1966 under the School of Education and is currently under the dividion of Student Affairs.

"The true founders of Upward Bound," said Lewis, "were the brothers and sisters in the street who created the pressures to make the government repsond to the needs of the people."

UB offers a wide range of academic resources to qualified students. The Amherst program recruits ninth and tenth grade students from Springfield, Holyoke, Amherst and other Western Mass areas. The program assesses the studnets' academic standing and their potential for college-preparatory work.

Once students are accepted into UB they participate in academic, career and family counseling as well as tutorials and cultural cativities. The program works closely with parents, educating them areound their roles and responsibilities in the school systems. UB also acts as students advocate, helping students schedule the proper classes and meeting with guidance counselors and teachers.

Perhaps the most important service that UB offers its students is giving them ongoing encouragement and confidence. Mulazimuddin Rasool, Springfield Area Coordinator, says, "We are creating the type of environment to help our students grow and thrive."

Rasool has developed a Needs Assessment program that will give UB a better idea of what skills are most needed by students. "Study skills, math akills and confidence are what is most needed," said Rasool.

In the last issue of NUMMO the criminal suit against Ronald Ebens and Michael Nitz, murderers of Vincent Chin, was incorrectly described. On Thursday, November 3 a Michigan Federal Grand Jury Investigastion indicted Ebens and Nitz on charges that they violated Chin's civil rights, harassed him and caused his death. The two now face life imprisonment sentences if convicted.

Black Land Crisis

by Russell Jordan
Nummo Contributor

Joseph F. Brooks of the Emergency Land Fund spoke last Wednesday on the crisis of Black land ownership in America. Brooks' lecture was sponsored by the Five College Faculty Seminar in Black Studies and was held in the Shirley Graham Du Bois Library in New Africa House.

"Currently Blacks own 6 million acres of land in active production, but are losing 330,000 acres a year," said Brooks. "At this rate, by the year 2000 Black land ownership will be zero."

Brooks said that land ownership represents the single largest asset of Blacks in the country. He blamed the loss of land by Blacks on several factors. Most of the land owned is in the South, and with the migration north of past decades, land ownership became misplaced.

Also, much of Black land is owned by several family members. Because of laws in several states, it is possible for a buyer to acquire land simply by paying a single family member.

Brooks also blamed overt racism on the part of several federal agencies in local Southern farm communities. "Blacks are not made aware of the same programs (as whites) and are often denied access to loans by these agencies," said Brooks. He added,"95 percent of the land in this country is owned by 3 percent of the people."

Brooks said Blacks were denied access to land in the past because of slavery. "There was no Homestead Act for Blacks like there was for whites in the 19th century, and several programs designed to break up large plantations after the Civil War were never passed or implemented."

The Emergency Land Fund was founded twelve years ago by Robert S. Brown of the Black Economic Research Center. The organization supports small farms and rural communities and has a financial assistance programs that has been responsible for 2½ million dollars in loans to land owners.

Ken Thorne's Unfair Trial

by Brenda Ling
Nummo Staff

(Note: Arresting officers were unavailable for comment and access to police arrest files is limited. The following information comes from Ken Thorne himself.)

On September 24, 1982 Trinidad native and Amherst resident Ken Thorne was arrested for receiving stolen goods. On October 17, 1983 Thorne was found guilty on those charges. Today Thorne claims not only police harassment, but mishandling of his criminal trial by the Hampshire Country Superior Court as well.

Thorne describes his case by saying, "It's a political case, that's the whole thing." He asserts that racism has played a crucial role in the police' and court's mistreatement of him. And he now charges an unfair trial, demanding a new legal defense.

In September 1982 an acquaintance, Richard Hargrave, asked Thorne for a $350 cash loan, giving as collateral a stereo system and a camera. The two had had only limited, social contact, but Thorne says, "I hate to see Blacks in any neighborhood not communicating with each other," and eventually loaned Hargrave the money.

Hargrave agreed verbally to repay the loan in five to ten days. Five days after the initial $350 loan, says Thorne, Hargrave "came up to me and tried to get another $300." Hargrave offered to give Thorne the streeo and camera for the second loan, but Thorne responded simply that he wanted his $350 back and would then return the stereo and camera. That night Hargrave was arrested and charged with theft of the stereo and camera that were still in Thorne's possession.

Hargrave cooperated with the police from the beginning by giving them information in exchange for exoneration from all his own charges. He told them that Thorne was keeping the stereo at a friend, Robin Howard's apartment, that Thorne had helped him to steal the stereo, and that Thorne possessed cocaine. The latter two are charges that Thorne eventually disproved. Nevertheless, in his statement Hargrave's objective was to escape his own charges, and this he achieved successfully by framing Ken Thorne.

Over a period of time Hargrave had stolen property from his lover's home, including the stereo, two cameras, a rifle, a coin collection and other items, even the shirt that he wore when the police picked him up last September. The total value of the stolen property is unknown, however, as Amherst police accuse Hargrave of stealing only the stereo and camera. These are the goods found in Thorne's possession after Hargrave tipped off the police.

On September 24, 1982 five police officers arrived at Howard's Puffton Village apartment searching for the stereo and camera. Thorne describes their having no search warrant, their wearing bullet-proof vests and their carrying guns, "like they were expecting to find a Black army with machine guns."

Instead the Amherst policemen, Detectives Burns and Zahn, accompanied by a Belchertown officer, found the stereo and then asked Thorne about the camera. Thorne volunteered the information that the camera was in his own apartment, so the police then took him back to Village Park to search for it and for the cocaine that they suspected him to possess. "They searched this place upside down," says Thorne, and refering to their having no search warrant, he declares, "They violated my privacy."

Such violations continued at length. Unfounded charges of Thorne's possession of cocaine, the illegal search through his apartment, his County Superior Court trial passed on allegations only and the police' easing on Hargrave after his informing contribute to Thorne's claims of discrimination.

After a year of investigation and with no substantial evidence for six of the charges, including possession of cocaine with intent to distribute, the court found Thorne guilty of receiving stolen goods, put him on probation for two years and fined him $250 in court fees. These fees are in addition to the $1600 that he spent on lawyers who he feels misrepresented him by not defending him assertively. Says Thorne of the trial, "Its' like a compromise verdict. The DA's final argument was that it's people like me who keep Richard Hargrave alive - it's the system that's keeping him alive."

The jury didn't believe him, but believed the stereo, Thorne continues. As for the court's discriminartory attitudes, he says that "just because I was found with the things, I was guilty. The police treated me like a nigger, like all Blacks are out there stealing." Hargrave, the one who did steal, has faded into the background. His name was never published in the newspapers and he was never tried for the thefts. This forces Thorne to question,"How come the investigation just stopped with me?"

After more than one year Thorne begins to take the offensive: "I plan on getting a new defense, a political lawyer to challenge how they got what they got. My lawyer will be able to prove how this system been pattin' this guy (Hargrave) on the back. I have (until November 27th) to pull this case together for an appeal. The problem is getting money to get a good lawyer." Thorne wants to bring the case back down from the Superior Court level to a lower court "where it belongs."

Thorne hopes that others understand his situation because, as he says, "this is not just happening to me, it's happening to other people, too, it could happen o them tommorow. "

In order to raise monies for new lawyers the Ken Thorne Defense Fund will sponsor a benefit concert on Sunday, November 20 at the Amherst Unitarian Church, from 8:30-10 p.m. Featured artsits include J.R. Mitchell, Will Pye, Ken Thorne, Stratis Funk, NTU Ensemble and other guests. There will be a $2 contribution toward Thorne's new and necessary defense.

Grenada Resolution Defeated

by Tracey Bryant
Nummo Staff

At the November 2 Undergraduate Student Senate meeting, Paul Gosselin and George McKenzie presented a resolution condemning the invasion of Grenada and calling for the immediate withdrawal of U.S. invading troops. After an hour and a half of questions and debate, during which McKenzie answered over 15 questions concerning Grenada and cited numerous U.S. reports on Grenada and the New York Times, many senators said they did not have enough information. Some said they wanted to look into the matter for themselves.

The resolution was reintroduced at Wednesday's senate meeting. Co-President Tom Ahern explained that the reintroduction occurred because so many senators abstained the first time and much of the senate felt they need more time to gather information on what the presidency felt was an issue of which students should be aware and knowledgeable.

After boycotting the remainder of the November 2 meeting because they felt much of the senate was apathetic and insentitive to the issues surrounding Grenada and the Grenadian people, the Third World Student Caucus and other pro-resolution proponents argued at the last senate meeting that there was ample opportunity and invitation to evacuate the American students before and without an invasion; that the airstrip was indeed commercial, not military; and that the Cuban and Soviet personnel on the island were, in fact, not military troops.

They argued that there was no connection between the Cuban and Soviet personnel and no plans to convert the island into a Soviet military base as evidenced by Soviet behavior and the airstrip construction.

They said the Cuban government also comdemned the murder of Bishop and did not support his murderers.

It was said that the U.S. would not have invaded a white nation. Segun Eubanks, a UMass student, pointed out that no one invaded America after the American Revolution, even with the enslavement of Blacks and genocide of Indians. He asked the audience, "Aren't you happy no one invaded this country? Aren't you happy we got a chance to work it out for ourselves?"

Many students felt that there was no justification for the invasion and that there was no danger to America or Americans. It was pointed out that Canada got its citizens out before the invasion and that air flight was not restricted or closed off. It was also pointed out that Canadian and British companies were major financers of the airstrip.

Much of the oppositional arguments revolved around the statement: "This is not a student issue." Some senators like Bill Collins supported the invasion and were angry that the senate was considering the resolution, which he felt was inapproproate for the student senate to make.

Some opponents felt that it was more important for the SGA to condemn the restriction of American journalistic freedom than the Grenadian deaths.

One anti-resolution speaker attempted to convince the audience that Grenadians supported the invasion. McKenzie pointed out the practicality of agreeing with people holding guns. Collins referred to a Collegian Black Affairs article written by someone he assumed was Black in an attempt to prove that Black people supported the invasion.

The Grenada resolution failed with a 40-opposed, 36-in favor, and 3-abstentions vote.

Of the students who attended Wednesday's senate meeting, a few voiced their opposition, but the majority supported the proposal. After the resolution lost, they chanted, "Down with U.S. Racist Aggression!"

First missiles reach Britain despite the opposition

LONDON (AP) — Europe's first cruise missiles arrived Monday at a U.S. air base west of London, provoking outcries from Britain's opposition lawmakers and anti-nuclear protesters who called the step "a major tragedy."

But the British government said it could easily withdraw the low-flying missiles if U.S. and Soviet negotiators reach an arms-control agreement in Geneva in talks scheduled to last six more weeks.

Just after dawn, a U.S. Air Force C-141 Starlifter transport landed at Greenham Common in the countryside 50 miles west of London. Armed soldiers ringed the plane as helicopters hovered and workers unloaded two crates containing the U.S. missiles.

Several hours later, Defense Secretary Michael Heseltine informed Parliament of the missiles' arrival, shouting to make himself heard above opposition lawmakers who screamed "shame! shame!"

Heseltine did not specify how many nuclear-tipped missiles were in the first shipment.

The missiles are the first of 572 cruises and Pershing 2s that the North Atlantic Treaty Organization plans to deploy starting next month if the Geneva talks remain stalled.

The missiles are to be deployed in Britain, West Germany, Italy, Belgium and the Netherlands. They are meant to balance the Soviet deployment of about 360 triple-warhead SS-20 missiles already in place.

The Soviets have threatened to quit the talks if the NATO deployment proceeds and say they will install more missiles in response. NATO has said that arrival of the U.S. missiles in Europe does not constitute deployment.

"The NATO deployment is planned to be completed over a 5-year period. It can be halted, modified or reversed at any time," Heseltine said.

Anti-missile protesters, encamped outside Greenham Common's gates for the past 26 months, were caught napping by the missiles' early morning arrival.

"Many of us probably feel like weeping, but we won't give way," protester Elizabeth Beech told reporters.

Monsignor Bruce Kent, general secretary of Britain's Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament, called the landing of the missiles "a major tragedy, not just for the CND or anybody else, but for the human race."

HAS SHE BEEN ON YET? — Responsibilities were put on hold Monday afternoon as hoards of people gather to see Laura eye Luke for five seconds.

Lust for Laura leaves lectures lean

By RISA FREEMAN
Collegian Staff

More than 150 students gathered in front of the Campus Center television on the first floor at 3 p.m. Monday awaiting the five-second return of Laura on the daytime soap opera General Hospital.

Students dragged over additional couches and chairs to the area, sat on the floor, in the aisles and even on the lockers in the back of the room for fifty-four minutes, when Laura, of "Luke and Laura" fame, finally appeared on the screen.

Most viewers knew Laura was returning Monday and waited anxiously through commercials and clues alleging to her comeback. Halfway through the episode, a curious bypasser approached the attentive audience and yelled, "Has she (Laura) come on yet?" One annoyed viewer replied with an angry "shhhh," while one other told him they (the crowd) were still waiting.

When asked why they were part of the "GH" crowd on this particular afternoon, most students said they came just to see Laura.

Karl Shultz, 21, a business major, said he used to watch General Hospital a lot until Laura left. He found out about her return in USA Today.

"This is sort of for old time's sake. I'd hate to miss an event this important," he said.

Joanne Ettinger, 22, a food marketing major, watched the show last Friday because she had read in T.V. Guide that Laura would be coming back then.

"I was really mad on Friday when she (Laura) didn't show up. I came down just to watch her today. I used to watch it (General Hospital) all the time until Laura left. I will watch it as long as she's (Laura) still on. I really like the chemistry between Luke and Laura. It puts romance back in the show," she said.

Alan Oskowsky, 21, a math major, said he's had a crush on Laura since he was in the 10th grade.

He watched it Friday as well, and will watch it as long as Laura is on the show, he said.

Ellen Klein, a communication disorders major, 21, had watched General Hospital since she was fifteen until Laura left the show. "I just skipped half a class to come down and see if Laura comes back," she said.

When asked if he will return to watch General Hospital today, one student replied, "I'll be here if Laura is."

Janitors' story continues with a 'mess' in SAO

By MICHELLE HYDE
Collegian Staff

Building Operations workers at the University of Massachusetts said Monday, Student Activities workers went "too far" in their complaint against some men's sitting in the hallway of the Student Union Building during their lunch breaks and defended their right to be there.

The women complained last week that the men were intimidating and leered and whistled at women who walked by, and suggested that the men take their breaks in the Hatch or in a private break room.

"As far as the whistling is concerned, we would have to deny it," Head Janitor William Smith said, adding that he had never heard any of the men whistle or make any remarks to women.

Smith, said the men do not spend their breaks at that spot for the sole purpose of watching women.

But Smith said, even if some of the men have whistled or made sexist remarks, "You can't call the whole group of us bad when there are only one or two that are bad."

"They (the women) didn't take the time to find out what we are actually thinking when we sit there," said Douglas Fuller, a janitor.

"It's obvious that these ladies want to make a point, but they just went too far."

He said they sit there in order to see people (they) haven't seen all day.

"If somebody wants to get a hold of me from 12 to 12:30 p.m. they'll know where to find me. But if I'm sitting in the Hatch or on the couches, they never will," he said.

Smith said the women who said they were whistled at or verbally harassed should have gone directly to the Building Operations Office and complained against a particular individual.

As a result of the recent press coverage of the situation, the men said they feel harassed themselves.

"We sit there now and students coo like pigeons and women whistle at us. I'm not going to sit there anymore and I'm not going to say 'hello' to anyone," said Bucky Battey, a carpenter.

Thursday, women in the Student Activities Office (SAO) found a live pigeon that had defecated on the desk of Judy Vagnon, a woman who complained about the janitors.

Gagnon said the windows had been closed Wednesday night but one was open when they found the pigeon in the office.

"It's very strange that the pigeon chose my desk in this very large office. Somebody called it poetic justice," she said.

Forrest Davies, the assistant manager of Building Operations said, "I know it wasn't any of the guys on the day shift but I can assure you we're trying to find out what happened."

Suspect arrested for fires in Amherst

An Amherst College student was arrested Sunday in connection with six suspicious fires at Amherst College this weekend, Amherst police said.

Police said they charged the 20-year-old man from North Carolina with arson, defacement of a building by burning, and malicious destruction of personal property. All the fires occurred late Saturday night in the vicinity of Pratt dormitory, policy said.

Rosemary Tarantino, of the Northampton District Attorney's office, said the fires are not connected to the rash of fires at the University of Massachusetts this semester, and that the suspect was arraigned Monday in Hampshire District Court.

In other Amherst action:

Five arrests Driving While Intoxicated were made this weekend, on East Pleasant, South Pleasant and College Streets. One suspect was stopped when he was observed vomiting out his window.

Two UMass students were arrested and charged with being disorderly persons Friday night near a North Pleasant Street bar, police said. The men, 19 and 21, were allegedly fighting.

A woman camping out on the Amherst Common reported a theft of her 9-foot papier-mache cruise missile at 7 a.m. Friday. No value was given.

Rebel cites integration as solution

WASHINGTON (AP) — Military intervention by other Central American nations to oust Nicaragua's leftist Sandinista government is "definitely an option," a leader of a CIA backed Nicaraguan rebel group declared Monday.

Adolfo Calero, head of the Nicaraguan Democratic Force, or FDN, said that approach would involve his Honduran-based forces establishing a government on Nicaraguan territory and then seeking aid from "friendly countries."

"We would ask for help if it would lead to a quicker solution to the Nicaraguan problem," he said.

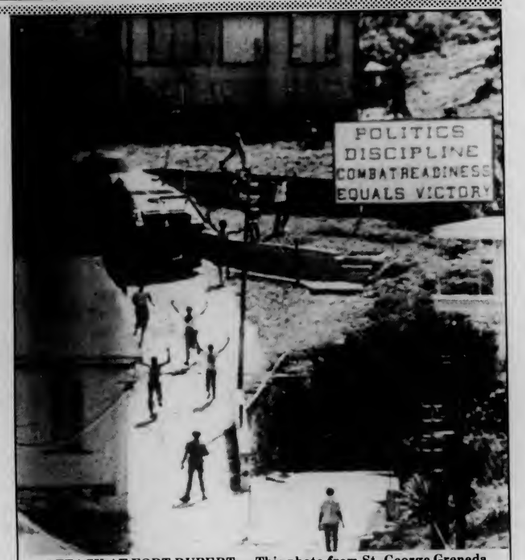
"Central America is a nation," Calero added. "Central America has a common background. It's interdependent economically, politically, socially. There will be no permanent solution to the Central American problems until we do integrate."

U.S. proposes 420-warhead limit

WASHINGTON (AP) — The United States Monday proposed to the Soviet Union that both sides cut the number of medium-range nuclear missiles in Europe, the State Department announced. The proposal would limit NATO and Warsaw Pact forces to 420 warheads each.

State Department spokesman Alan Romberg said Paul Nitze, chief U.S. delegate to the intermediate-range arms reduction talks in Geneva, Switzerland, presented the U.S. offer to the Soviet delegation Monday.

Romberg noted that under the offer the total proposed U.S. intermediate-range force of 420 single-warhead missiles would equal 140 three-warhead Soviet SS-20 missiles, "which is the number they have proposed to limit their SS-20 forces in the range of Europe."



He said the United States was "attempting to be responsive to the Soviets by accepting this level of deployment while insisting on our own critieria for an agreement."

Truce becomes victim of war

BEIRUT (AP) — Druse shells hit Christian east Beirut on Monday, the Lebanese army fired at militiamen in nearby mountains and U.S. jets roared over central Lebanon.

In Israeli-occupied southern Lebanon, Israeli troops guarding the Awali River bridge shot and killed an unidentified man who tried to lob a grenade at them, the military in Tel Aviv said. Earlier, a roadside bomb slightly wounded two Israeli soldiers as their vehicle traveled east of Tyre, the command said. It did not elaborate.

As the largely ignored Lebanese civil-war truce entered its eighth week, the new U.S. special Middle east envoy Donald Rumsfeld conferred with President Amin Gemayel and top aides in Beirut.

AROUND THE NATION

Court upholds male societies

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Supreme Court set aside rulings Monday that could have forced the nation's colleges to ban student honor organizations that exclude women.

The justices ruled by a 5-4 vote that a dispute over the University of Miami's past support of one such all-male group is now moot, or legally irrelevant. The case was sent back to an appeals court with instructions to dismiss it.

The court's decision, however, left unanswered the key question that was before the justices: May the federal government cut off all federal funding to schools that offer significant support to such groups?

The justices said the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals never should have reached its decision forcing the University of Miami to ban a group called Iron Arrow from its Coral Gables campus or face the loss of all federal money. Iron Arrow, founded in 1926 by the school's first president, long was regarded as the most prestigious campus organization.

Bloodless surgery safer for organs

ANAHEIM, Calif. - (AP) Open heart surgery using no transfused blood has been performed on almost 100 infants and children by chilling their bodies and diluting their blood with water and nutrients, doctors said Monday.

In comparison to conventional surgery, "bloodless" surgery results in less loss of blood and places less strain on the kidneys and lungs, said Sambamurthy Subramanian, chief of cardiac surgery at Children's Hospital in Buffalo, N.Y.

Scab labor allows buses to roll

PHOENIX, Ariz. (AP) — Striking Greyhound bus drivers in five cities burned or tore up back-to-work notices Monday in defiance of a company deadline. Meanwhile, Greyhound said it would have buses rolling again Thursday in 27 states but without cross-country service.

Greyhound Bus lines, which normally carries 60 percent of intercity bus traffic, said it would resume abbreviated operations with new hires and non-strikers.

The company had given the 12,700 members of the striking Amalgamated Transit Union until noon Monday to tell the company whether they planned to go back to work Thursday under a new contract that would cut wages and benefits.

AROUND THE REGION

Boston polls indicate King's failure

BOSTON AP - Melvin King said he'd fool the pollsters today and become the first black mayor in Boston's 353-year history, but frontrunner Raymond Flynn also predicted victory and proclaimed, "I can make Boston one city."

After a compaign that downplayed race in a city often marked by racial tension, Flynn held a solid edge in polls of voters who were picking a successor to the retiring Kevin White.

Both said turnout was critical, and each dispatched more than 3,000 workers to get out the vote in an election that was delayed a week by a court challenge to voting district boundaries.

John Donovan, the chief registrar of voters, said turnout could reach a record 70 percent "if it's a good day and everything goes well." But rainy skies and gusty winds of up to 25 miles an hour were forecast.

Flynn and King ran low-budget campaigns reminiscent of the door-to-door efforts of Mayor James Michael Curley in the 1930s. Each spent only about $200,000 in the final election; in contrast, White spent $1 million in winning his fourth term in 1979.

Governor seeks funds to end hunger

BOSTON (AP) — Saying he was shocked by recent reports on hungry children in Massachusetts, Gov. Michael S. Dukakis announced plans Monday to seek extra state funds to buy food for infants and pregnant women.

"I must say personally that, for me, simply tolerating these kinds of conditions and permitting youngsters to be damaged because they don't have decent food to eat is simply unacceptable," Dukakis said at a news conference in his office.

Flanked by the leaders of the House and Senate, Dukakis said Massachusetts would be the first state in the nation to spend state money to make up for shortfalls in the federal Women, Infants and Children nutrition program — known as WIC.

Senate President William Bulger, D-Boston, said the legislative package would mean an extra $30 per month for each qualified family "if we're successful in putting this through the Legislature — which we will be." House Speaker Thomas McGee (D-Lynn) added, "There's no question the bill will go through."

All told, the state's Democratic leaders are seeking $6.6 million over two years to supplement the WIC program in fiscal years 1984 and 1985, provide targeted nutrition assistance to Southeast Asian refugees, help insure that all residents eligible for food stamps and Project Good Health programs actually receive benefits, and provide for emergency removal of lead paint where needed.

Educator blasts social creation of 'dumb jock'

BOSTON (AP) — A black educator criticized the U.S. colleges and universities Monday, calling the "black dumb jock" an "American sports tragedy."

"Dumb jocks are not born — they are being systematically created," Dr. Harry Edwards, associate professor of sociology at the University of California at Berkeley, told a gathering at the University of Massachusetts-Boston.

"Over 65 per cent of college athletes on scholarship never graduate. And they have no basis on which to return after turning professional. A basketball player averaging $243,000 or a National Football League performer averaging $93,000 isn't going back to classes to listen to some $13,000 associate professor tell him how to succeed in life."

Peabody athletes lose rights to remain on teams

PEABODY, Mass. (AP) — Two 17-year-old [illegible] athletes who lost their places on high school teams because the police found them drinking also have lost bids for reinstatement.

Judge Robert Mulligan in Essex Superior Court at Peabody rejected a bid Monday by Scott Bedell and Christopher Nicholas, who wanted reinstatement on school sports teams after they were suspended for drinking, school attorney Daniel Donovan reported.

[illegible] attorney, Claudia Sullivan of Belmont, had contended that police should not have released a report about a Nov. 5 incident in which both submitted to breath tests determining the young men were legally drunk.

Both are seniors at Masconomet Regional High School. Bedell was dropped from the football team, and Nicholas from the soccer squad.

Hampshire student receives degree in Frisbee

By PAUL BASKEN
Collegian Staff

While earning his degree during the past five years, John Dwork has been outstanding in his field — or the Rose Bowl's. Or Madison Square Garden. But always while throwing a frisbee.

And in January, Dwork will receive from Hampshire College the world's first Bachelor of Arts degree in "Flying Disc Entertainment and Education" — he majored in frisbee.

"I'm a fairly average student except for the fact that I got into something fairly unusual," said 22-year-old Dwork, who used the frisbee as a "catalyst to study subjects including business, dance, natural science, and physiology.

With his small piece of plastic, the 1978-79 World Flying Disc Freestyle Champion has worked as a promoter and a marketing consultant, appeared on shows from the Wide World of Sports to Sesame Street, lectured at a graduate school, founded a magazine and library devoted to the Grateful Dead, and formed his own company.

"People are saying my degree represents the ideal," Dwork said. "It's almost like I've made legitimate — I wouldn't say the California surfer image — (but) the whole new American alternative lifestyle."

A product of a small private high school where he said he was learning things that had no effect upon his life, the New York City native knew since age 16 what he would choose to study in college.

STUDYING HARD — The world's first frisbee major studies as he does some reading in the Hampshire College Library.

For that reason, he picked Hampshire, a campus of 1,100 pupils, founded in 1970 to offer students a chance to create their own discipline and then carry through an individual course schedule tailored to it. Its students progress through three divisions: basic studies, concentration in a chosen field, and advanced studies.

In completing his requirements, Dwork performed a number of projects which "if you didn't use the frisbee would be normal college courses," he said, covering subjects such as public relations, marketing, and management. These included courses he took at the School of Management at the University of Massachusetts, where he maintained a B-average.

Upon passing his Division III requirements in October, Dwork became the first person to ring the college's "division free bell," newly installed to symbolize a student's completion of each division.

In completing his Division III, Dwork went a step further than the usual Hampshire criteria of proving his ability to pursue a career in his field — he began one. He provided prototype design, marketing consultation, and product endorsement for a new line of discs from AMF Voit. He also formed his own comapny, "Freestyle For Food," a traveling professional flying disc demonstration team which donates a large part of its revenues to CARE, the international world hunger organization.

Despite all of his success, however, Dwork realizes the problems majors such as his present for the college.

"Hampshire is having a problem that I'm having as an individual," Dwork realized. "Either you stick to your convictions or you change to fit society."

"I think there are people who don't perceive us as being a serious academic place," said Richard Alpert, the college's director of planning. "The image we have does not match the reality. At every institution people get by with doing a little less than serious work."

"We're at a crossroads at Hampshire," Dwork said, "As long as the students are willing to take chances, and not be afraid of the long lonely road to success, then much good will come to the place. At the same time, if the administration gets pressure to be socially acceptable, then students will have a hard time."

Career Day causes class cancellations in S.O.M.

By MARK PRATT
Collegian Correspondent

All School of Management classes will be cancelled today for the school's sixth annual Career Day at the University of Massachusetts.

The day long seminar, to take place on the first floor of the Campus Center, will feature speakers from various large corporations, a luncheon, keynote address and reception. Speakers will discuss business in general, accounting, marketing and management, according to Undergraduate Business Club President Steven Schiffman.

Career Day's objective is "to help students get a better understanding of career opportunities in business environments," Schiffman said, adding that students "will be shown the paths open to them."

Although called the School of Management Career Day, the event is open to all students, Schiffman said.

"We encourage all majors to come--it can't be emphasized enough," Schiffman said. He said he expects about 1,000 students to attend.

As well as guest speakers, there will be a luncheon from noon until 2:00 when the keynote address will be given by Thomas Bonafair, the executive vice president of Coca-Cola, Northeast. The buffet-style luncheon will allow students to mingle with all the speakers in a "much more professional atmosphere," Schiffman said.

A reception from 4 to 6 presents the opportunity for students to give speakers their resumes and establish more formal interviews for later dates. Many students have obtained jobs directly through career day, Schiffman said, citing recruiters attending the day in the past. Juniors and sophomores often get internships, he added.

Education project explains sexual harassment procedure

By RITA MURPHY
Collegian Staff

Since 1982, the University of Massachusetts has had a formal sexual harassment policy and procedure. Despite being distributed to students as they enter the University, the policy is still not widely known or understood.

The Sexual Harassment Education Project was set up a little less than a month ago to help educate students, workers, faculty and others in the University community about the policy, procedure, and definition of sexual harassment.

"Sometimes (people) assume others know what sexual harassment is, but many people don't know what it is. Our main objective is just to get people to know what it is and what they can do about it," said Teri Hamlin, coordinator of the project.

UMass defines sexual harassment as a form of discrimination that can make a person uncomfortable on the job or in the academic or living environment, impede the abilty to work, or interfere with employment or educational opportunities."

The project helps set up workshops around campus geared towards making people aware of the campus policy on sexual harassment.

Sexual harassment is a really big problem on campus and most people don't know that, Hamlin said.

The project does not only try to educate individuals on how to detect if they are being sexually harassed, but the group also tries to educate harassers or potential harassers, in an effort to try and stop harassment or prevent it from ever taking place, she said.

The project is trying also to educate as many men and women about sexual harassment.

Sexual harassment does not only effect women it is a people's problem, Hamilin said.

The group currently has just 12 members, but keeps growing all the time, member Mark Gross said.

Currently the project is seeking volunteers who are willing to be trained in leading workshops around the campus educating individuals, but because few people realize the group exists it has had trouble getting members.

"It's kind of hard right now," but as the group gets older new members are expected, Hamlin said.

Police report motor accidents

By MARY ANNE BEEN
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts police responded to a report of a motor vehicle accident at 12:25 p.m., Saturday in the Southwest horseshoe. According to the report, one vehicle struck a second vehicle while leaving a parking space. Damage has not been estimated. There were no injuries.

In other police action:

Shortly after 11:30 p.m. Nov. 10 police responded to a report of a motor vehicle accident on Fearing St. One car had been traveling west on Fearing St. when a second car backed out of Lot 50 near Cance dormitory, according to the police report. Due to wet conditions, the first car was unable to stop, and both cars sustained $500 worth of damage, police said.

More than $350 worth of personal belongings were reported stolen from the Blue Wall shortly before 11 p.m. Nov. 11. A man's black leather jacket, valued at $150, a woman's grey leather jacket, valued at $50, and various other items were taken from a chair in the Blue Wall, according to the police report. There are no known suspects.

A wallet and its contents, valued at $70, was reported missing shortly before 3:30 p.m. Nov. 11 from an unlocked dormitory room in Gorman, police said. The student apparently left her room for 15 minutes, and upon return, discovered her wallet stolen, according to the police report. There are no suspects.

Grads invite activist to lecture

BY SEAN CASEY
Collegian Staff

In an attempt to increase interest in the lecture series, the University of Massachusetts Graduate Forum will bring labor activist Ray Rogers to speak on Dec. 4 at 7:15 p.m. in Memorial Hall.

Rogers, a UMass graduate, developed and directed the 1976-80 strike against the J.P. Stevens Corporation by the Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union.

Rogers, co-founder of Corporate Campaign, Inc., was "labor's chief strategist" by the Journal of Commerce. He exposed and attacked Stevens' corporate financial links, which resulted in the company's eventually signing labor contracts in 1980.

Corporate Campaign, Inc. provides organizing, research and communications services to its clients.

According to Senate President Sonjiv Dugal, this Forum will be a "gauge" to see if the sparsely-attended lecture series will be continued.

"The graduate dean is seriously questioning funding the series, since attendance at the last Forum was so low," Dugal said.

The Graduate school, with the Graduate Senate, co-sponsors the lecture series, which costs about $4,000 per speaker.

In other business, Greg Graham, a member of the Graduate Teachers Organization (GTO) steering committee, announced there will be a public forum on the GTO at 7 p.m. today in Campus Center room 101.

Representatives from the organization and a representative from the Massachusetts Teachers Association will be on hand to answer questions about the organization's efforts to start a union for Teaching Assistants and Associates on campus, Graham said. The association is helping the GTO membership drive.

The senate also voted to allocate $350 to the Turkish Students' Association, which is raising funds to help with relief efforts after the Nov. 1 earthquake in Turkey. The quake left about 1330 people killed and many orphaned.

A representative from the Turkish Students' Association said they hope to raise at least $1,000, all of which will be donated to the Red Crescent, the Turkish Red Cross.

Board of Ed. holds open meeting

The University of Massachusetts School of Education will host a meeting of the Commonwealth Board of Education at 9:30 a.m. to 4 p.m. today in Mark's Meadow Gymnasium.

The meeting is open to the public and verbal and written comments on the issues under consideration are welcome, according to a statement issued by the Board.

The Board will present an award to the Massachusetts Teacher of the Year, discuss school-business partnerships and amendments to the state basic skills policy, and hear reports on state teacher certification and program approval policies, according to the statement.

Select Board grants licenses to renovated Justin Ryan's

By JULIA MAYCOCK
Collegian Correspondent

The Amherst Select Board Monday night unanimously approved the transfer of a liquor license from the bankrupt Joey D's to the renovated Justin Ryan's which will hold its grand opening on Nov. 28.

The nightspot near the Price Chopper Shopping Plaza will be managed by Bob Ross, a 23 year-old University of Massachusetts alumnus and former Minuteman football player. Ross still needs approval from the Massachusetts Alcohol and Beverage Commission before Justin Ryan's can open its doors.

When it does open, Justin Ryan's will be a "sports-minded bar," Ross said. The main feature is a kick-off lounge downstairs complete with a 50-inch video screen attached to a video recorder. Ross will show sporting events and movies.

"It will be the kind of place where you can come and spend the night instead of somewhere you rush in and out of," Ross said.

Justin Ryan's will also provide dancing and will cater and lease for special functions. It has a seating capacity of 280. Sandwiches, hamburgers, potato skins, and natchos will be served. Ross said most of the fare will be price under $4 except for steak.

Ross had hoped to open sooner but said he underestimated the amount of time it would take to apply for the license, establishing approved hours of operation, and obtaining special permits for playing recorded music and capacity levels.

"We simply underestimated the amount of time it would take for certain meetings to take place," Ross said.

The Select Board also granted a transfer of a liquor license at the Hungry U, located on University Drive, from former manager George McQuillen to present manager Antigoni Kostides.

Force sponsors Oxfam drive

By LINDA LODIGIANI
Collegian Correspondent

University of Massachusetts students who wish to participate in Oxfam America's "Fast for a World Harvest" on Nov. 17 can sign up at all dining commons beginning today.

The UMass Hunger Task Force, along with University Food Services, sponsors of the drive, are urging all students on the meal plan to skip Thursday's dinner. According to University Food Services Director Marie V. Cappadonna, $1.15, the actual cost of the food, will be donated to Oxfam America.

Students can sign up with the cashier at any dining commons through Thursday's lunch and tables will be set up on the Campus Center concourse for those not on the meal plan who wish to donate to Oxfam.

Last year the University donated almost $1,500 to Oxfam America through the meal program, and the Hunger Task Force was able to solicit another $1,000 from cash donations, Task Force Coordinator Dan Stockford said.

The UMass Hunger Task Force is a group of about 15 students, formed to educate the community on the issue of world hunger. Stockford said in the past the group has held small sessions in dorms to educate students and most recently sponsored lecturer Nola Reinhart, who spoke on Oxfam America and world hunger.

Oxfam America is a non-profit agency that funds self-development programs in Asia, Africa and Latin America, and works to educate Americans about the causes of hunger around the world, Stockford said.

This year, he said, the Hunger Task Force plans to set up a UMass food bank, to which institutions donate bulk food which is then sold at a low cost to community service organizations.

Stockford said the group also plans on contributing to the Soup Kitchen which is held at the First Congregational Church in Amherst.

Project teaches methods for leadership

The meetings are a place where women can discuss personal issues going on in their lives that are common to all women.
— Betsy Jelliffe

A five-week "Brown Bag Lunch Series" called, "Women in Power: Alternative Forms of Leadership," begins today at the University of Massachusetts. The event is sponsored by the Women's Leadership Project, a student-run organization working towards the empowerment of women.

Betsy Jelliffe, coordinator of the project, said the series will feature a variety of women in the five-college area who will lead open and informal discussions on different forms of leadership roles for women.

Today's discussion with two Indian women, titled "Finding a Voice; Women of India," will be on the collective forms of leadership skills that women in India have used to mobilize for social change. The talk will begin at 12:30 p.m. in room 178 of the Campus Center.

Jelliffe said in the past the word 'leadership' has had a corporate image meaning a director at the top of a hierarchy, and the series is striving to change this.

"We want to educate people about the different forms of leadership and change the connotation of leadership to mean much more," she said.

The Women's Leadership Project is an organization open to all women designed towards the empowering of women in a variety of ways by offering a resource center, programming and networking.

Their office offers a free library with literature on career planning, abortion, financial aid and sexual harassment issues, as well local and national resource directories for women.

Earlier in the semester the project presented a women's film festivaldesigned to show the diversity of women's lives and Jelliffe said another one is planned for next semester along with other events.

"We are planning, in conjunction with the Women's Issues Team, a day long event centering around pornography, rape, and self defense featuring films, workshops and panel discussions," she said.

Also planned for next semester are workshops on public speaking, assertiveness training and self-defense.

Every Tuesday at 6 p.m. the project holds a meeting that serves as a self-education session and a support group.

Controversy

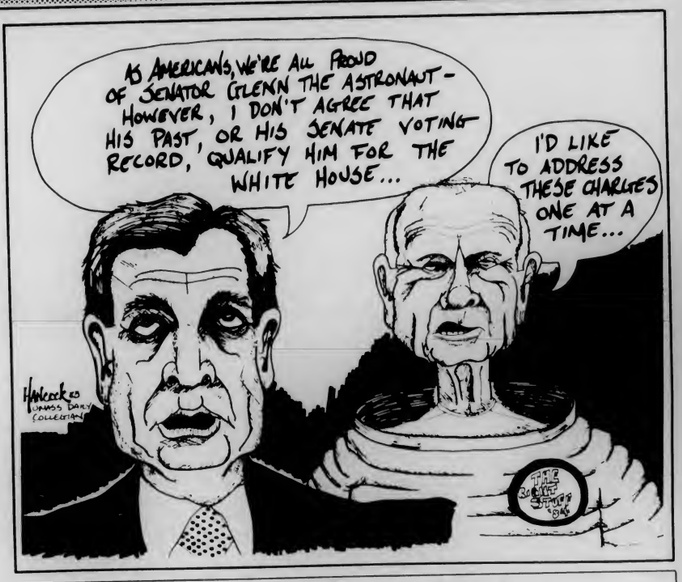
Course schedules and Ads

I was outraged to pick up the new course schedule book on Thursday and find that it was paid for in large part by the US military and multi-national corporations.

"It's cheaper," was the explanation given by the people handing out the books. "We save a lot of money this way."

I'm sure we do save a lot of money this way. Perhaps we could also save a lot of money if the University catalogue and other promotional material had ads for the Marines, the Navy and General Motors, along with our syllabi, class handouts and final exams. Maybe we could save even more by having our courses taught by military personnel and corporate representative instead of professors. Better yet, we could scrap our top-heavy administration and academic departments and let the Pentagon and Trilateral Commission run the University. We'd save a bundle that way.

Where do we draw the line?



The military-industrial complex (an old but not at all outdated term) already exerts tremendous influence over our lives and educations. Reaganomics has shifted hundreds of billions of dollars to the military from education, job development and other social programs. The military absorbs huge amounts of R & D money for science and technology, and so is largely responsible for the current movement of academic resources and priorities away from social sciences and humanities to technology and science. Now they are capitalizing on a situation of their own creation, in which public universities must grovel for funds from any available source and graduates must grovel for jobs from any available source, to increase their influence over our educations.

Five full-page, full-color ads for the military in a course schedule guide have an especially insidious influence, more so than ads in other student-oriented publications, including newspapers like the Collegian, which those responsible for recruitment and PR for the military obviously know. First, as a publication of the administration of the University, the values and activities of the military now have the administration's de facto seal of approval. Secondly, and most importantly, in Reagan's world of ten-plus percent unemployment and rampant jingoism, the ads have a strong but subtle effect on students' decisions as they choose their classes and majors. And as the direction of students' educations are effected, so is the overall direction of the University effected.

We should not have to choose between higher tuition, fees and taxes on the one hand, and having our educational services be underwritten and subtly directed, on the other hand, by the very people who are stealing money away from education and other vital social services through trillion-dollar defense budgets and tax loopholes. UMass is supposed to be a publicly-financed educational institution, not one whose educational direction can be sold to the highest bidder.

There's a fine line between influence and control. I'm afraid we won't know where that line is until we've crossed it.

Goodbye Mayor White

Today signifies the transition of Boston politics from old-time backroom Kevin H. White tyranny to a mayoral contest which for the first time in years will be determined by younger, disenfranchised, and newly registered voters. Both Raymond L. Flynn and Melvin H. King have passed up the opportunity to run a traditional campaign based on extensive paid advertising in favor of a grassroots approach to recruit citizens who they consider to be potential voters.

Alan P. Smith

New blood inspires change. There can be no doubt that the two frontrunners, King and Flynn, have inspired a new interest in voting in Boston. Since 1982, more than 74,000 new voters have registered in Boston. Almost 25,000 of these people have registered in the time following the preliminary election just a few months ago.

One of the most important results of this increased attention to downtown and neighborhood politics is the focus upon issues which have remained dormant under the old-boy dictatorship of Mayor White. After 16 years, the people of Boston finally face the real possibility that their opinions and needs will be addressed, not only during the election campaign, but in post-election City Hall as well.

Despite the few isolated incidents of minor racial violence during the last two weeks, this election campaign has given credibility to the belief that Boston is shedding its reputation as a haven for racist thought and action. While differing on actual implementation of discrimination guidelines, both candidates have bent over backwards to cater to the needs of minorities and poor whites alike.

For Mel King, the major obstacle to be overcome is the appearance that he is not substantatively different than Flynn. In a race where the voters perceive the candidates to be more similar than different, it will be no surprise for Boston voters to vote along color lines. In such a scenario, Flynn the white will be Flynn the major. Boston may be making strides towards less racist culture, but white voters must be given concrete imperatives in order for them to vote against a historical and cultural trend.

Mel King or Ray Flynn, the city of Boston faces a bright, more representative city government. Lets hope that the new Mayor will have as much success courting the executive appointments which will be relics of the White dynasty as they had courting the voters of Beantown.

Catcalling by pigeons

To the Editor,

I am grateful someone has finally spoken out as to the offensive catcalling that occurs outside the campus center barbershop as I have been subjected to it whenever I walk by and various janitors have been sitting there on break.

This is a problem that will not dissolve unless it is openly faced. Just this week in the library two men got on the elevator and leeringly looked at my sweater, and one commented to the other that he liked meat. I was so angry and disgusted. One of the men said to his friend that he was reading a book on lesbianism and his ignorant companion questioned just how it was they got it on together.

I feel women have supressed their anger over sexual harassment in this society far too long, taking it for granted as an expected hassle. I for one am tired of being subjected to it without fighting back.

Right of the press, and people

To the Editor,

I applaud Mr. Barrett on his column of last Thursday. His opinions are amusing to hear and certainly provide some entertainment.

Mr. Barrett offered us a possibility. What if 'this nation waged a successful war, its cause was just, the people gave cover it?' He then asserted that such a scenario had occured in Grenada. He went on to castigate the press for being too overzealous in its 'persecution' of Reagan's policies, an attitude he found somewhat understandable since the Government had a history of lying to the press (e.g. Watergate and Vietnam).

Nowhere does Mr. Barrett tell us what signs of grace President Reagan has that makes his reign deserve a 'complete and unequivocal support'. I maintain that only because of such a 'liberal, anti-Pentagon' press were we able to learn about Watergate and Vietnam. Only Barrett's 'cynicism and skepticism' will protect us from abuses of power today. Don't give me a brown-nose press praising the virtues of Reagan but the angry dogs of Mr. Barrett's vision of journalistic hell. Reagan's converts already praise him enough. If his virtues are real they will survive the attacks of the most rabid critic, for it is a strange truth that doesn't survive the scrutiny of an informed citizenry.

Mr. Barrett and his 'opponent', Mr. Brunelli, center the debate on the rights of the press, forgetting the people that institution pretends to serve. Reagan didn't hurt the press, he hurt us by controlling the number of skeptical people who can tell us more than just Reagan's fantasies.

Paul K. Illych

More than a political issue

To the Editor:

I attended the SGA meeting on Wednesday November 9. There was a debate about whether or not the SGA should pass a resolution condemning the invasion of Grenada. The motion failed, 40 against, 36 for and 3 abstentions.

who are on the right and people who are on the left. It doesn't matter, however, what political stand you take on this issue. It is not merely a political issue. It is a human issue.

As students in the U.S. it is so easy for us to cut ourselves off from the rest of the world. It is not our country being invaded and our citizens being murdered. We are not in any direct danger so why is it our concern? We are people with hearts and minds like all other people. Whether we are black students or white students, men or women, or members of any other category which divides people; we are members of the human family.

We need to realize that there are other people around the world who would like to live their lives without any external forces intervening. Now, there are a lot of people who will be throwing out this rhetoric about the Communist threat in Grenada. There is not true communism in this world just as there is not true democracy. Each are theories which in practice have never achieved their aims.

We are lucky in this country that we are able to debate issues like Grenada in a government body, and we are able to try to direct the course of our government. There are body bags coming back from Lebanon, and a new generation of First-strike weapons about to be deployed in Europe. These are all student issues and we all need to think about them. The possibility of a draft and the threat of nuclear war are not going to go away unless we educate ourselves, and take actions to condemn war.

"The money required to provide adequate food, water, education, health and housing for everyone in the world has been estimated at 17 billion dollars a year. It is a huge sum of money... about as much as the world spends on arms every two weeks."

Klezmer music revived

KLEZMER CONSERVATORY BAND
Saturday, November 5
John M. Greene Hall
Smith College

By RONDA APPLEBAUM
Collegian Correspondent

About 1700 people piled into John M. Greene Hall at Smith College on Saturday evening to see the Klezmer Conservatory Band play "Jewish Jazz."

Klezmer music originated in small communities in Eastern Europe and was spread by street musicians, Klezmorim, who incorporated strains of folk music and cantorial music. When Klezmer music came to the U.S. in the early 1900's it was influenced by dixieland and later by jazz.

The Klezmer Conservatory Band began back in 1980 when Hankus Netsky discovered that he had klezmer musicians in his ancestry. He put together a klezmer group and they put on a concert at the New England Conservatory of Music. He found that there was a great demand for Klezmer music and therefore, decided to make the band public.

There are fifteen members of the band; fourteen are musicians and one is a vocalist. They play a wide variety of instruments ranging from the piano and the accordion, to the drums and the violin.

The music that the band played stemmed from Chassidic songs and songs from the Yiddish Theater. The songs were lively and spirited. The kind of music that made one want to get up and do a hora; and that is just what people did. Throughout the evening people were doing sort of a "line dance" version of the hora along the aisles; while in the back of the hall, young men and women were doing old Russian-Yiddish dances and horas. Everybody was having a good time, including myself.

The Klezmer band generated a lot of warmth and spirit. The people who weren't dancing were tapping their feet and clapping their hands to the music. Both young and old were having a great time. Even though audience members were sometimes distracted from the band because they were watching the other audience members dance, they didn't fail to recognize the talent on the stage.

Judy Bressler, the vocalist in the group, had a pleasant voice and appealing stage persona. She sang in Yiddish, but before each song she would explain the lyrics in English. Different songs featured different musicians, but I have to say the one who captivated me the most, was the clarinetist, Don Byron. He was featured several times but really made the audience rave when he did a medly of yiddish music mixed with show and classical music.

If you missed this enjoyable performance, that was sponsored by the five-college Hillel, you might have the opportunity to see the Klezmer Conservatory Band on T.V. NBC was filming parts of the performance for their show, "First Camera," which is shown on Sundays at 7:00 p.m. The show will deal with the resurgent interest in klezmer music.

Klezmer Conservatory Band at Smith: made one want to get up and do a nova.

Fire draws a big blank

UNDER FIRE
Hampshire 4

By JOE SHARTRAND
Collegian Correspondent

Under Fire treats the controversial United States intervention into Nicaragua as an inspiring contest between the U.S. backed Samoza government and the rebels. Hollywood has trivialized the complex struggle of the Nicaraguans into an adventure film complete with a love triangle. The plot centers around a free-lance photographer (Nick Nolte) who arrives in Nicaragua as the Samoza regime is attempting to quash a rebellion led by an enigmatic communist, Rafael. Nolte is unmoved by the rebel's cause, for, as he continually repeats, he is only there to take pictures. But eventually, he ends up helping topple the Samoza government with his photographs; while all of this is going on, he is having an affair with his best friend's girl. These characters, who revolve around Nolte, are all interesting in their particular situations when they are not involved in the love triangle.

Nick Nolte is very unconvincing as the hero because he doesn't seem to have any feelings for anyone, except his camera. His face just goes slack when he is supposed to be concerned, or else he goes into a rage at the people who he has hurt. His cameras seem to be the only things that he is attached to. Gene Hackman as Nolte's unfortunate friend can't do much with his role, though he does try. But in the second part of the film, after the love triangle has been dissolved, his character becomes involved in the most frightening scene of the film and Hackman plays it to the hilt. Joanna Cassidy, at the center of the love triangle, is an interesting actress. She doesn't have much influence over the events in the film and seems to be there only to be reunited with Nolte at the end so that there could be a happy ending.

Under Fire, as an adventure, has exciting and scary moments, but it is pretentious and dangerous to portray an authentic war as glamorous under any view. Even if the hero is largely unsympathetic a reaction can be provoked from the audience by good supporting performances, frightening situations, and huge and explosive special effects. Exploding trucks, machine-gun blasts, gernade explosions abound in this film wherever our hero is. This isn't the way it is; U.S. photographers and journalists aren't running around the streets of Nicaragua determining, with their news stories or photographs, the outcome of the war, or what form of government will take power. The journalist isn't always a winner, or even a good guy, as portrayed in this film, and war even if fought by rebels seeking freedom, isn't always just. This picture seems to be saying that if you support the right causes and you're a journalist, you won't be a causalty of war. What this film is trying to do is force a romantic image of war onto a totally unromantic reality.

Not all of the film's moments are based on the adventure formula, there are some moments that are so unromantic and frightening that they ring true. For example, Gene Hackman and Nick Nolte are driving down some Nicaraguan street when the discover that they are hopelessly lost. Nolte stops the car and Hackman gets out to ask directions from a woman who is standing in front of her demolished home. She explains in Spanish that she doesn't know where the hotel is, and Hackman turns around to shrug and smile at Nolte. He then goes down to a group of Samoza soldiers who are hanging around on the corner. He saunters down toward the soldiers and as he approaches them one of the soldiers points a rifle at his belly and demands his credentials. Hackman has his hands above his head and is slowly lowering them while smiling and shrugging at Nolte who is taking pictures of his predicament. Both are used to this routine. But instead of handing Hackman's credentials back, the soldier shoots him, no questions asked. Hackman slowly goes down as Nolte photographs the whole incident. Hackman's assasination is particularly frightening because he is the most likeable character in the movie and he was completely defenseless. This was what one imagines real war to be like: a slaughter of human-life. Unfortunately, realistic scenes like this were very few, and usually the film reverted to an adventure formula of car chases and killers who chase the hero.

There is nothing wrong with the adventure formula if it is anchored in a fantasy situation but when a real-life situation is used it makes the fantasy a bit hard to swallow, especially when one might be drafted to fight in this particular situation. It's all right for Indiana Jones to fight the extinct Nazis, but for Nolte to fight U.S. intervention isn't quite the same. Under Fire is only occasionally realistic and it is only then that this film deserves our interest.

Rand Theater gets a new sign: "I think the woman has started eating again."

New herald for Rand's wall

By ED BEEN
Collegian Staff

A look at the wall outside the Rand Theater at the Fine Arts Center reveals something different. Look again. A new painting for the theater announces a new season of student produced drama.

Professor Jeffrey Fiala, who teaches set design at UMass and is responsible for the new 36' by 16' work, also did last year's piece. He said that although this one is similar to the old one, changes have taken place.

"I think the woman has started eating again," he said. "The couple has grown up, they have matured."

The flat graphic style of the work combines blues, oranges, yellows, and browns in a scene painting context that employs the heavy use of shadows.

"I've tried to use the colors to achieve a 3-D effect. Differences of effectiveness depend on the distance it is looked at."

Fiala, who said the work was done "out of the goodness of my heart," said the piece took one and a half weeks to complete, and is done on a material called versaboard. The artist is a graduate of the University of Wisconsin with degrees in Theater and Stage Design, and has been teaching set design at UMass since 1970. He also free-lances, has worked in New York City, and at Stage West in Springfield.

Fiala said that black and white prints of the new work will be displayed on the sides of a half dozen PVTA buses to advertise each upcoming Rand Theater production.

"We hope to connect the image of the painting with the Rand itself. The painting will remain for the rest of the '83-'84 season. One a year is enough."

Upcoming shows at the Rand Theater will include The Shadow Of A Gunman, and A Bedtime Story, that will run simultaneously in a twin bill December 1-3, and 7-10, 1983 at 8 p.m. For more information call the Department of Theater at 545-3511.

John Couig leads UMass golf

By TOM SCOLLINS
Collegian Correspondent

Being captain of a collegiate sport is a nice accomplishment. Senior John Couig became University of Massachusetts golf team captain after learning to play golf at the age of 21.

The Pittsfield native started playing five years ago while in the Army and his intensity earned him the Washington military district championship one year later. After serving in the Army, Couig enrolled at Arizona State University and tried out for their golf team. ASU boasts one of the top teams in the country and he found himself off the team when last cut was made. Not to be deterred from this, he went out and became intramural champion of a 65,000 student campus. Not bad.

But New England called and Couig decided to come home and enter UMass after a year at ASU. He entered in spring 1982 and played golf the following semester. He quickly asserted himself as a leader and was elected captain of last spring's team along with being chosen MVP at the close of the season. John was again elected captain of the team and after a successful summer was looking forward to it.

"I played a lot this summer and won a couple of tournaments and placed second with Tyler Shearer in a two-man tournament at our home course, Hickory Ridge," Couig said. He also won a long drive contest in Pittsfield with a tremendous 320 yard shot.

The management major credits his chipping and putting as his strong points but does not see himself becoming a teaching pro in the near future because of the lack of open positions. He does however teach the General Physical Education classes that are open to the students.

Couig will be graduating this December and will be missed to the team for his leadership, but his is optimistic of the future of the UMass linksters.

"It's a promising young team with a lot of potential. It just needs to be developed.

Couig feels that all the travelling to play and practice tends to hurt the freshmen (four on this semester's squad) who are new to the University. He said he could see the team as a contender in the next few years.

Couig proved to be an essential part of UMass golf these past seasons and will be hard to replace. Not many people can become a collegiate captain with less than five years experience.

Water polo has successful season

By STEFANIE SCHMALL
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts water polo team ended up eighth in the east, with an 18-9-1 record, as they wrapped up the season in Annapolis this past weekend.

The team suffered a 13-3 loss to Brown in the first round, and second round action provided an easy victory for Harvard. UMass had a bad game and fell hard by a score of 10-3.

In competing for the seventh place position, the men played strongly against Washington and Lee but were defeated 6-5 in a close, tough match.

Although the numbers might be deceiving, the team played well this weekend and end up with an impressive eighth ranking for the season.

"All twelve players really pulled together. We earned a lot of respect this weekend," said Coach Russ Yarworth who was pleased with the performance of the team.

Three members of the UMass team are potential candidates for the All-New England Team, including senior goaltender Andre LaMontagne, and top scorers Chris Porter and Paul McNeal.

By 4:00 p.m. yesterday afternoon, the University of Massachusetts volleyball team's fate had been decided by the ECAC selection committee. UMass would be one of the four teams invited to play in the ECAC post season tournament.

The four selections - Springfield College, C.W. Post, Northeastern University and UMass - were the top teams of the 65 volleyball programs in the Northeast. All four teams are currently positioned in the top five slots in the most recent Northeast regional rankings. The number one team, New Haven, has decided to bypass this tournament to participate in the Nationals.

The teams have not received the seeding for the tournament, but the schedule of events is already laid out. Beginning this coming Friday night, each team will play one three out of five series. The single elimination tournament will conclude on Saturday night when the victors from Friday night square off against each other at the Springfield gym. The winner of this match will be crowned as the ECAC tournament champions.

For UMass, the road to this tournament has been a long one. The spikers began their season on September 14th at American International College and have traveled the northeast coast compiling a 34-16 record.

The most recent match was a tough loss to Northeastern which the spikers may have a chance to avenge. That match, however, is history and was no indication of the brand of volleyball Coach Elaine Sortino's corp has played all season.

The teams' most recent victory was a nerve racking win over Springfield. As one observer put it, "That was one of the most exciting sports events I've seen in a long time." That is the type of volleyball this team plays.

As said before, the road has been a long one and it has not been real smooth either. Just shy of the half-way point in the schedule, the spikers were hit with two injuries. Leslie Smith, one of the top net players was hampered by recurring shoulder problem and missed several key games. Kirsten Smith was the other casualty when she sprained her ankle at the same tournament L. Smith was injured in. Both players have since returned, but are just beginning to take on their active roles.

The spikers have played their hearts out this season. A suitable end to their season would be just two more victories and the ECAC championship, then the road can end.

The last game blues of an athlete

By MICHELE DOLAN

One week ago Saturday was the last game this season for the junior varsity field hockey team at the University of Massachusetts. When the horn sounded at the end of the game against UConn, the season was over. Now I will have to look back at the season as a whole instead of looking forward to each day of practice and taking it one day at a time.

It was a season that started way back when people were still at the beaches. For the players who came to preseason practice, it was a commitment that stretched through the whole day as we endured triple session workouts. We'd joke every morning about the sun index in the newspaper, trying to predict what kind of a tanning day it would be. There was no question of why we were here. We were practicing to be the best.

Then school started. We practiced once a day, from 3:30 to 6:00 p.m. New freshmen tried out, and our team was finally complete. Next we had to get it together, just like all teams at the start of the season. It was a challenge to begin to know each other and play as a team.

Practice was a part of the day. It came after classes and just before studying. It was something to look forward to and to think about.

Finally, on September 23rd, we walked into the locker room at NOPE and picked up our uniforms for our first game against Mt. Holyoke College. It was our first chance to really be a team. We won, 2-0.

Then we played Springfield College and lost 1-0 in the pouring rain. It was a game we thought we deserved to win. There were six games after that, after which we compiled a 4-2-2 record.

Suddenly it was over. For the UConn game on that Saturday, it was cold and wet. But that wasn't important to anyone at NOPE that day. What was important was that varsity was challenged by the number one team in the NCAA to show their stuff. And that for us, it would be the toughest game of our season.

We lost, 1-0. But, we played well and we proved that we were a good team. Our defense stood strong and our offense fought characteristically hard for a goal.

At the end, we shook hands with the UConn players. Our faces were red, and our long-sleeved uniforms were stretched on our arms assymetrically. It was hard game and a tough loss.

Then we left the upper field and went down the hill to the locker room. I felt a sad, empty feeling. It was as if someone had come and pulled the ground from under our feet. In fact, they asked for everything back. So we all congregated around the equipment cage and gave them our sticks, cleats, shin guards and uniforms. At that moment the obligation was gone. There would be no practice Monday and nothing to do after classes.

The season was over, but everthing it meant was not.

On my first day of "freedom" I felt defensive, even hurt. It seemed unfair that there wouldn't be another chance to play. The process of becoming a team was one that took a lot of work and time. We had spent our afternoons preparing for our games and trying to uphold the challenge of excellence. Now it was like someone had come along and said, "This is the end of your team."

The end of the season always comes. But an athlete knows that the end of the team never comes. The team is still there in the constant effort that made them able to work together. They are still there in the jokes and the friendships that made the practices fun.

So, even though at the end of the season the athlete is forced to give back his equipment, he or she never gives back his team.

Dear Haywood, I've got an idea...

By RUSS WHINNEM
Collegian Staff

An open letter to Haywood Sullivan, Jean Yawkey, and...alright Buddy Leroux too:

Hi guys (no offense Jean). How's tricks? It has reached my attention down here at the Collegian Sports desk that you're looking for a new first baseman. I've got a suggestion.

There's this guy right now roaming around the National League looking for a job. He's a pretty good ballplayer. He's done things like lead the league in hitting, been a clutch guy, and made hustle his middle name. You may have heard of him, his name's Rose — Pete Rose.

Now guys, before you disregard my correspondence just hear me out. See, I figure you need three things in your new first baseman. Ability is the obvious, but two intangibles also come into play (no pun intended), attitude and box office attraction.

Mr. Rose's ability is not all that questionable. I realize the fact that he didn't have what you would even classify as a good season last year. But you've got to admit that the platoon system Owens came up with put Pete out of his element. He is a player that through self-admission has to play consistently to do his best.

But let's get to the other two elements. First the attitude. I'm talking winning attitude here. All reports indicated the Sox were a more than slightly disoriented and discouraged club by last year. I think we know that certain financial and power problems could have had a lot to do with this, but let's not dwell too heavily on that here.

Anyway, you need a guy with a winning attitude, someone who knows how to win. Especially since the Captain bid a fond farewell in October. Pete is perhaps the connoisseur of winning attitudes. He's been a part of so many top clubs. If hustle is his middle name then winning is his last. It's what he eats, sleeps, and breathes. Pete Rose is a winner and around him that same feeling could become present.

The third point guys, is that Rose is an attraction. Hey, there are a lot of people around the old ballpark that, shall we say, aren't too pleased with the way things have shaped up the last couple years. I'd say that they'd love too see an exciting name in the new line-up. Rose is an instant drawer, worth an awful lot of tickets.

Think about it. Sure Pete's an old man, but he's worth another couple years, especially with the DH rule.

Anyway, take care, and good luck with this little control battle you're having. Personally, Buddy, I don't think you have a leg to stand on. But then again, who am I to say. Really, give Pete a call. Trust me.

CC leaks will go on unrepaired

By PAUL TOMICH
Collegian Correspondent

Repairs on the increasingly leaky roof of the Campus Center may be at least two years away, Campus Center and University officials reported recently.

According to an Oct. 3 memo from Campus Center Director William Harris, there are now 18 leaks, up six since 1978, in the Campus Center, where the roof has leaked since it opened in 1970.

"The most profuse leaks are experienced in the most trafficked areas," the memo states. "This is a double-edged sword, as the areas which are revenue producing are also the most affected by water damage."

While University Assistant Merchandise Manager David Curley said he considers the leaks "more of an inconvenience" than a source of property damage, Harris's memo states 50 percent of lower level meeting rooms and hallways must be recarpeted "as a result of mildew and water damage."

The water leaks are caused by breaks in the waterproof membrane located beneath the building's bluestone roof, according to the Physical Plant's chief design constructive engineer. Once water penetrates the membrane, it can travel between the membrane and the concrete until it finds a crack leading into the building's interior.

"Just because you see water dripping down below doesn't mean a leak is directly above it," said Edmund Ryan, chief engineer, noting this process makes it difficult to locate and repair the leaks.

Ryan said a construction consultant's estimate to replace the membrane, which would entail removing and replacing the bluestone, was $3 million in the late 1970s. No further studies have been conducted since then, he said.

Until those repairs are completed, there is no point in repairing or replacing something that will just become damaged again in the next rainfall, Dudley Bridges, Campus Center building operations manager, said, citing the lower level carpeting as damage that will not be repaired in the near future.

Funding for repairs on UMass Building Authority owned buildings, such as the Campus Center, must come from the Authority itself, which now has a bill in the Legislature requesting a debt limit increase from $80 million to $100 million. If approved, the Authority would have an additional $20 million to fund repairs on the Campus Center and other Authority-owned buildings on this and other UMass campuses.

The limit increase could raise student fees, which are used directly to pay off all bonds, according to Student Government Association Rents and Fees Committee Chair Cindy Lehmbeck.

Jack Littlefield, director of planning in the Office of Vice Chancellor for Administration and Finance, said that while he anticipates the legislation to be approved, he does not expect repairs on the Campus Center or other buildings to begin for "the next couple of years."

"In the meantime," he said, "we will just continue with the problems."

Personal injury due to the leaks has been minimal so far, according to the assistant manager of Buildings Operations and safety officer of the Campus Center.

Forrest Davies said, "people have fallen, but no one has been seriously hurt," from water on the floor.

While no one has brought any lawsuits against the Campus Center because of the leaks, Davies said "the situation is critical" because the potential for serious injury is there.

Better work, wages help few women

By DIANE LANE
Collegian Staff

Although working conditions and wages have improved for women in the past decade, the number of women affected by those changes is only a minority, a Wellesley College economist said at the Jones Library Tuesday night.

Theresa Amott, a visiting professor at the University of Massachusetts, said that there has been a trend toward increasing "feminization of poverty" in American society.

"Single head-of-household women living below the poverty level has increased by seven percent in the past decade," Amott said.

Amott said that although more women are moving into traditionally male professional jobs, the overwhelming majority of jobs for women are still in the traditionally female jobs.

"For the first time the unemployment rate is lower for women than for men but the flip side is that women have traded unemployment for underemployment," Amott said.

Amott defines underemployment as working beneath one's skill level, with no promotion possibilities or at a job where not enough is made to support a family.

Amott said that "motherhood is the kicker," meaning that unmarried women with children are likely to be poor.

Amott cited Department of Labor statistics that showed women workers with four years of college earning the same income as men who had only had one to three years of high school. In addition women high school graduates made the same income as men who had not completed elementary school.

Amott said women choose to take low-paying work rather than to stay on federal aid, even when it isn't in their long term financial benefit. because of "lack of privacy, surveillance and stigma while on welfare."

Strategies for the future would be greatly enhanced by full employment, which Amott says is possible.

"The present administration has a vested interest in keeping a certain degree of unemployment so that workers won't get too sure of themselves," Amott said.

Amott said issues that working women have felt to be important in the past, such as equal wages and promotion, are not as crucial for the future. Women need more of a say about what kinds of jobs are created in the future, she said.

Amott said the occupations that will be producing the most new jobs nationwide into the 1990s will be typically dead end and low paying. Women need to obtain more political power and to exploit the gender gap.

"I have never before been involved in politics but getting the present administration out in 1984 is the first step here," she said.

PLO rebels fight on

TRIPOLI, Lebanon (AP) — PLO chairman Yasser Arafat's fighters claim they repulsed a tank assault by Syrian and Libyan-backed mutineers Tuesday, but the rebels kept shelling the besieged Baddawi refugee camp and parts of Tripoli.

Hospital officials said at least 13 people were killed and 75 wounded in the fighting that shattered a four-day lull, but police said the toll could go much higher.

In the Beirut area, anti-government gunners pounded the Christian-populated east sector of the capital and nearby port of Jounieh. Casualties in that fighting were not reported immediately.

A communique issued by the Palestine Liberation Organization command said three battalions of Syrian troops with 60 tanks spearheaded the attack on the Baddawi refugee camp outside Tripoli behind a barrage of artillery at 7 a.m.

US naval attache shot

ATHENS, Greece (AP) — A motorcycle passenger fired at least seven bullets from a .45 automatic into the stopped limousine of a U.S. naval military attache Tuesday, killing the officer and his Greek civilian driver.

Police said the killer and his accomplice roared off on their motorcycle down a side street of suburban north Athens after the morning rush-hour attack, and that no group had claimed responsibility by late Tuesday.

Capt. George Tsantes, 53, serving with the Joint U.S. Military Advisory Group in Greece, was hit by at least four bullets. Police said he was sprawled in the back seat, his civilian clothes drenched with blood.

"There was blood everywhere inside the car. We hauled them out of the car but there was nothing we could do for the American," said Athens police officer Athanasios Zafirakis.

Congress debates acid rain control

WASHINGTON (AP) — A sharp reduction in pollutants, paid for in part by a fee on consumer electric bills, was proposed Tuesday by New England congressmen as a way of curbing lake-killing acid rain.

But the fee provision hit a quick snag, opposition from Sen. Robert T. Stafford, R-Vt., chairman of the Environment and Public Works Committee that will consider acid rain legislation for the Senate.

While praising the House members for coming up with a plan, Stafford said, "We must guard against the temptation to win support for an acid rain control program by adopting a financing scheme that would reward the polluting industries and penalize those who have been paying the cost of good citizenship."

Stafford said electric customers in the Northeast and West already are paying higher bills because they have cleaned up already.

House nears another ERA decision

WASHINGTON (AP) — The House headed today toward a decision on the Equal Rights Amendment after several Republican-led attempts to derail a vote failed.

"The debate on this topic has gone on for 60 years and I think that's long enough," said Rep. Peter W. Rodino, D-N.J., chairman of the Judiciary Committee.

Kennedy reviews American hunger

PIKEVILLE, Ky. (AP) — Sen. Edward Kennedy, DMass., will end a series of public forums on hunger and deprivation in America with stops in eastern Kentucky on the day before Thanksgiving, his office said Tuesday.

"The purpose of the tour is to determine the extent of the problem, the effects of unemployment and government policies on the problem, and possible solutions," said Melody Miller, reached by telephone at Kennedy's Washington, D.C., office.

"In each locality he will conduct public forums to hear from affected citizens and persons in the public and private sectors concerned with hunger in America," Miller said.

State prison 'skirts' purchasing laws

BOSTON (AP) — Framingham state prison split purchase orders to avoid putting contracts out to bid and possibly paid more than than it had to, the state auditor says.

"By skirting state purchasing laws, the prison may very well have paid more than necessary for the work," Auditor John J. Finnegan said Tuesday.

Finnegan said the prison violated state purchase procedures by splitting the orders.

In a report released today, he said the prison issued 14 contracts worth more than $30,000 for repairs and alterations to floors, doors and carpets between July 1, 1980, and Sept. 7, 1982. All of the orders were kept below $5,000 to avoid advertising for bids, the report said.

Dukakis develops drug strike force

NEW BEDFORD, (AP) — Gov. Michael Dukakis says he will form a statewide drug strike force to combat the multi-billion dollar drug trade, and proposed the sale of ships confiscated in drug raids to help finance the battle.

"The attorney general and I will work with the district attorneys on a very tough, very effective, statewide drug strike force that can crack organized crime and the people that are making billions and billions of dollars from these enterprises," Dukakis said Tuesday.

Dukakis's remarks were made at State Pier, where three vessels taken during drug raids this summer are tied.

Flynn wins Boston mayoral election

BOSTON (AP) — One-time school busing foe Raymond Flynn was elected mayor Tuesday, defeating black community activist Melvin King to succeed 16-year Mayor Kevin White.

Flynn, a 44-year-old city councilor, received 106,035 votes or 66 percent compared to King's 54,563 votes or 34 percent, according to unofficial returns from 201 of 252 precincts compiled by WBZ-TV. No official results were immediately available, but other unofficial counts by news organizations confirmed the margin for Flynn.

Immediately after polls closed, all three major Boston television stations said their exit polls showed Flynn would easily win the runoff election and succeed White, who is retiring after 16 years.

Flynn captured 80 percent of the white vote while King took 95 percent of the black vote, according to an analysis by WNEV-TV.

King refused to immediately concede and said it felt "wonderful to be part of a campaign, part of a group of people, who tried to make Boston whole."

Flynn and King, who topped a field of eight mayoral candidates in the Oct. 11 preliminary election, tried to minimize the racial issue as they mounted low-budget efforts for the final nonpartisan contest.

PRO-SOLIDARITY—Jacek Kalabinski, a Polish journalist and president of the Warsaw Chapter of the Polish Journalist Association, the newspaper union, last night said solidarity is alive because of a Polish informational network.

Info network keeps union alive

By KEN BAZINET
Collegian Staff

A Polish journalist who fled that country last September when he found police waiting to arrest him at his Warsaw home last night said an underground communication network is keeping the Solidarity movement alive.

Jacek Kalabinski, a reporter for 20 years, and a former president of the Warsaw Chapter of the Polish Journalists Association, a newspaper union, said 162 newspapers, 18 publishing houses, and two news services are keeping about 250,000 members of the Solidarity Underground united.

"The common story in the Underground press is simply instructions of how to survive and how to cope with martial law," said Kalabinski, 45, currently a visiting fellow at Yale's Institute of Social Policy Studies.

Kalabinski said he escaped from Poland on Sept. 26 after he had spent two months in hiding at the home of his wife's former music teacher. He said he was able to receive a Yale fellowship on such short notice with the help of some of his former classmates at Stanford University, where he studied in 1978.

Kalabinski said he would be in Poland today if his name was not blacklisted along with another 1,200 Polish journalists.

His problems worsened when a column which he wrote for the editorial pages of the Los Angeles Times praising Lech Walesa on winning the Nobel Peace upset Poland's ambassador to the United States in New York.

"They said there were problems with my passport," he said. "I kindly wrote them and told them that my passport was good for two more years."

Kalabinski said the Solidarity Underground today is not simply union activists, but now has scholars in its membership.

"This is probably the first time in history that Poland's intellectuals and workers are united," Kalabinski told the 30 students and faculty members gathered at the School of Management at the University of Massachusetts.

"All the strategies of martial law which the government used backfired," he said. "I was terrified for the first hours of martial law, but the terror quickly faded away."

"Some concessions are going to have to be made to the Polish people," he said referring to both his government and the Soviet Union's control over Poland. "The concessions will lessen the strain on the Eastern European nations."

"The reality is so grim that many people are ready to sacrifice themselves if it would help Poland's future generations," he said.

The Solidarity Underground also has a network of safe houses and legal service agencies, he said. Kalabinski said small book collections, which he called "travelling libraries," are circulated throughout Poland.

Historians, philosophers and educators also visit small groups of underground members as a "travelling university," he said.

Technical skills such as producing a publicaiton are also taught to Underground members, he said.

Board of Education proposes focus on basic skills

By JOHN O'CONNELL
and LAWRENCE BOUCHIE
Collegian Staff

Local school systems in Massachusetts will face yearly state reviews of educational progress in major curriculum areas if the legislature accepts recommendations made by the state Board of Education at a meeting held Tuesday at the University of Massachusetts.

The Board also recommended that a state-supplied and graded test of basic skills improvement should be taken by all ninth-grade students, that school districts which score low on evaluations should receive financial assistance "for educational remediation," and that the state should "not establish, at this time, statewide graduation requirements based on passing the basic skills improvement tests," according to the final motion.

The Board's action here was the culmination of a two-year review of the state's Basic Skills Policy, a set of teaching and curriculum guidelines first adopted in 1978, Board Chairman Donald B. Walker said.

State Department of Education Commissioner John H. Lawson will present the board's recommendations to Gov Michael S. Dukakis and the state Legislature for consideration. Lawson said the recommendations will not go into effect until at least 1985.

The Board originally planned to make state basic improvement tests mandatory and state standards established, at the fifth-grade level as well as in the ninth grade, but after hearing complaints from local school administrators and representatives of the Massachusetts Teacher's Association (MTA) and the state Parent-Teacher-Student Association about this proposal, they decided to maintain the present basic skills policy for the elementary school level.

Stephen Baker, director of measurement evaluation for the Worcester Public schools, asked that the board allow local systems to continue administering their own basic skills tests at the fourth-grade level.

"The basic skills policy has been successful," Baker said, while the board's recommendations for improvement are "vague and indefinite."

Citing a "tradition in Massachusetts to leave things to the school committees wherever possible," Walker said the board was "modifying our initial stance by taking into account the learned opinions of people here today."

The Board later discussed but did not vote on approval processes for teacher preparation programs. An outside review team for the UMass preparation program, chaired by Professor Peter Witt, of Brandeis University, presented a report on the UMass program.

Witt cited "the interest and intelligence of the university representatives" to the program review procedure and praised the "careful organization and access" provided to the review team, but he said "the repetitive nature and cumbersome amount of paperwork required by the state" hampered the process.

Lawrence Locke, a UMass physical education professor who met with the review team, said "it would be hard to streamline the process without a loss of information."

"If programs are to do things their way and be accountable," Locke said, "the process will be cumbersome."

Jewish abortion views given

By RONDA APPLEBAUM
Collegian Staff

While abortion is considered morally wrong for Jewish people it is permissable because Judaism maintains that "life begins at birth" and a fetus is not a full human being, said Dr. Fred Rosner, who spoke at the University of Massachusetts Tuesday.

In a speech sponsored by Hillel, Rosner, director of the department of medicine at Queens Hospital, said, "Judaism does not sanction abortion on demand," but under certain conditions a woman can have an abortion.

A woman cannot, according to Jewish faith, have an abortion because of financial or social reasons, or because she is raped or the baby is genetically defective, he said. But if it is determined that the woman would be endangered mentally because of the rape, she has the right to an abortion.

If the mother's mental or physical health is in danger abortion is allowed because "she is a full human being and the fetus is not," he said.

"After birth one cannot touch the fetus because it is now a full person. You can't sacrifice one life to save another life," he said.

This belief that life begins at birth contrasts with the Roman Catholic and other Christian beliefs that life begins at conception, he said.

Rosner said Rabbis have interpreted this belief from a portion in the Old Testament in which a pregnant woman is accidentally hit in the stomach and suffers a miscarriage. The person who hit her only has to give her financial compensation and is not punished.

"The fetus has status because it is a potential human being. Therefore it is morally wrong to kill the fetus. But technically, it is not wrong because the fetus is not a full human being until it is born," he said.

"Everyone has a right to an abortion but that doesn't mean abortion is right," he said.

Police get peeping tom complaint

Amherst Police reported an incident of a man spying into a window of a Webster Court residence at 9:07 p.m. Monday.

Police said the female complainant observed the man outside her window when he tapped the glass to get her attention. She then turned off the lights to better see who it was and the man fled, police said.

The woman, who said she did not get a good look at the man described him about 5 feet 7 inches tall, thin, with curly black hair and wearing a plaid jacket, police said.

Amherst woman injured in crash

University of Massachusetts police received a report of a motor vehicle accident at 11:18 a.m. Monday on Massachusetts Ave. Police said Helen N. Lee, of Amherst, apparently lost control of her vehicle while in the eastbound lane and crashed into a 24' concrete pole. Estimated damage to Lee's vehicle, a 1983 Honda, was in excess of $3,000 and damage to the pole was $2,000, police said. Lee, alone in the car, was injured and treated at University Health Services, according to police.

In other police action:

Two 18-year-old John F. Kennedy dormitory residents were arrested Monday and charged with receiving stolen property, police said. A search warrant was carried out, according to the police report, and the two men were found to be in possession of stolen stereo equipment. Value of the equipment has not been estimated. The two were arraigned in Hampshire District Court Tuesday, police said.

SGA begins ratification of their new constitution

By JOHN O'CONNELL
Collegian Staff

News Analysis

The revised version of the Student Government Association constitution has been a long time coming, but when the Undergraduate Student Senate begins considering this new version at tonight's meeting, the long process of ratification will be just beginning.

That process will result finally in approval of the constitution, the SGA itself in effect, by the University of Massachusetts Board of Trustees. Senate Speaker Chris Sullivan said this has not happened in almost 30 years, but even with Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey's threatened cutoff of SGA funds if his deadlines for completion are not met, many members of the Senate say they do not want to rush the process to meet any deadline.

To begin the ratification process, the senate must first pass the revised draft by a majority vote and send it out to the area governments. If four out of the seven area governments do not reject the draft, it comes back to the senate for a two-thirds vote and, if approved, goes on to Duffey and then to the Trustees.

The draft could be changed at any level of the ratification, and in fact has gone through a few already. The original revised draft, submitted to the senate floor for initial consideration three weeks ago, was partly written by a task force over the summer and finished by Sullivan and SGA Treasurer Eric Nitzsche this semester.

Since then, the senate Governmental Affairs Committee has been making recommendations for a final draft.

As of press time last night, Committee was beginning its third, and members hoped last, open meeting to consider revisions to the constitution.

The committee's first meeting lasted two hours, and the second, held Monday night, lasted five hours. Committee Chair Jay Flynn said the committee has "basically covered about 80 percent" of the charter, but with the most extensive and controversial proposed changes still on the table, Flynn was not making any predictions.

The committee is now considering three different documents: the present constitution; the draft submitted by Sullivan and Nitzsche; and a "constitution of the Association of United Students," submitted by Central Area Government President and Senator Timmi Rudolf Monday for a new group he calls the "United Areas Council."

Flynn said the committee is "taking the old constitution and using Eric and Chris's document and now Tim's also as the means of coming up with a synthesis."

Flynn had proposed to delay consideration of Rudolph's document "because it proposes fundamental changes" and would delay senate approval which could endanger SGA funding.

Rudolph said he "will work for nothing to get a good constitution passed." He said his document will emphasize "distinct levels of student government," and "separate the branches of student government."

He also proposes to limit some powers of the senate and make the judicial branch and the office of SGA president "a little more powerful."

Changes in area government funding requirements for SGA membership, and on-campus senate elections have been recommended by the committee so far, but Flynn said most of the approved changes involve separating details out of the charter and into the bylaws.

The draft recommended by the committee changes area government funding from a fixed contribution per student ($8.40 per year) to a percentage of the Student Activities Fee paid by all full-time students. This percentage is tentatively set by the committee at 12 percent.

Students must carry at least eight undergraduate credits and pay the student activities fee to be a member of the SGA, under the new draft. The present constitution requires that students only carry one credit and pay the fee for SGA membership.

The new draft also states that all senators will be elected at-large from an area, in proportion to the area population, as off-campus senators are now. The present constitution mandates that every dorm have at least one senator, and dorms with populations over 250 have two or more senators.

"Greenough doesn't have a senator now. But I know people in Baker and Chadbourne who would like to run for the senate," Rudolph said.

SGA co-President Charlene Allen expressed doubt that the senate would agree to such a measure, but Flynn said the exact area and population of each senator's constituency would be moved to the bylaws, and decided by the senate.

The Governmental Affairs Committee is now considering three documents: the present constitution, a draft submitted by Senate Speaker Chris Sullivan and SGA Treasurer Eric Nitzsche and another constitution, submitted by the "United Areas Council."

UMass G.O.P.—Bill Pyne, center, president of the UMass Republican Club, and other club members meet the public on the C.C. Concourse Tuesday.

Conservative students say join the club

By DAVID SUMMERSBY
Collegian Staff

It all started when first-year English major William Pyne filled out a classified advertisement in the Collegian looking for people interested in organizing the conservatives on campus. Four weeks later, the University of Massachusetts Republican Club has a phone list of more than 100 names and a politician coming to speak.

"I was sick of all the liberalism and radicalism on campus and I know there had to be people out there who shared my conservative political views. I found there are quite a few," said Pyne, now club president.

Pyne said UMass is referred to by many as "a haven of liberalism," and the club is seeking to change this notion by counterbalancing the liberal element on campus and giving the conservatives a voice.

To ensure that its voice is heard, the club will bring conservative speakers to campus, hold rallies and encourage its members to join the Student Government Association, Pyne said.

The first speaker will be conservative Massachusetts politician Ray Shamie.

"Much of the radicalism here is a perception because they (the radicals) are highly visible. But we are finding there is a large conservative voice that is not being heard and whose presence will be felt," said sophomore history major Steve Erickson, club treasurer.

Another goal of the club is to support the government of the United States.

"We are proud of our country and we want to revive patriotism.

"It is upsetting to see so much dislike for the government. When one goes to a radical student rally on campus in opposition of American foreign policy they don't get a feeling of pride or support for their country," Erickson said.

"In any given social system there are bound to be flaws but I think the United States is the best country in the world to live in. We want to eliminate the flaws and work to make the country better," Payne said.

--Steve Erickson, Club Treasurer

The club holds organizational meetings once a week and sets up a booth in the Campus Center for community visibility and attraction of more members every Monday and Tuesday.

Pyne said response to the club has been excellent.

"When I first put the advertisement in 15 people called me, and on the first day we had a booth. We got about 80 signatures," he said.

"I think the members are glad to have found a group they can relate to because they are also upset by the radicalism.

"We all thought we were alone before. All it took was a spark," he said.

The UMass Republican Club is affiliated with the Massachusetts College Republican Union and plans to work closely with similar groups at Amherst, Mt. Holyoke and Smith Colleges. Another Republican club at Hampshire College is also in the organizational stages, Pyne said.

The club is currently in the process of sending out a newsletter and is also petitioning the SGA for funds.

"It is going to be a good year. I think it is fun to start a club and watch it grow," Erickson said.

Weighty decisions: Duffey's first year

By JILL LANG
Collegian Staff

Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey looked at ease as he spoke. Quality education, educational opportunity and decisions, decisions penetrated conversation as he reflects on the achievements of his first year in office at the University of Massachusetts.

Duffey, 51, said he believes he has made a good beginning; but he hesitates:

"I think this place is very big and very complex and it would be a great mistake to feel that you know or understand it after only a year," he said.

For the first time in ten years, I am feeling like there is leadership that is focusing our interest on academic quality.
--Bonnie Strickland

Duffey said he has trouble finding a parking space outside Whitmore; even the Chancellor, it seems, cannot escape the occasional bureaucratic foul--ups common to a large university. This is an example of Duffey's knowledge at least, of some of the problems at UMass.

An improved university budget has helped Duffey to meet some of the important developments during his first year. He said he has gotten a hold of the space problem on campus; with the money generated from his proposed $50 tuition increase. Adding sections to overcrowded courses; renovation of Goessman Laboratory, the largest academic building to be renovated in the history of the university, and the library tower reconstruction top Duffey's list of important issues.

"This is the time we've really got to devote ourselves to--and have been, after all, the campus has devoted itself--to growth and quality," Duffey said.

Duffey expects the University to maintain its office space in Springfield. Plans for a placement center to be located in the former Alpha Delta Phi house are also underway.

Of his future at UMass, Duffey spoke in abstract terms.

"I think we have a lot more renovation and repair work to do on this campus," he said. "They're not very attractive and they're not very glamorous, but they affect the quality of University life."

Bonnie Strickland is a special assistant to the chancellor. She has been at that capacity for a little over a year, at UMass for ten years, and has seen administrators, deans and department heads follow each other out the door.

With Duffey, things are different, Strickland said, but her tone implies a different attitude from most people who comment on the chancellor.

"For the first time in ten years, I am feeling like there is leadership that is focusing our interest on academic quality," Strickland said.

"That is what a major university is all about," she said.

If Duffey could turn UMass into an Ivy League of public institutions, he would do it. Even so, he is modest when he speaks of his accomplishments, reserved in his predictions of the future.

AT HIS EASE -- UMass Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey relaxes . . . .

When Duffey arrived, only two of four vice chancellor positions (Student Affairs and Administration and Finance) were filled. Restructuring Whitmore has been steady; most new administrative officers face a transition period when building their staffs.

Duffey said the people he has worked with over the past year have all been "patient and gracious."

Duffey has changed his perceptions "on many things, on the basis of listening to people...how complicated some problems are and how they should be dealt with."

"I hope I can continue to listen," Duffey said. "But I don't think this campus wants somebody who listens and then just sort of tells people what they want to hear."

"There's a lot more to learn, and a lot more to do, and I need patience when I make mistakes and people who have been here longer to teach me, people to correct some of my perceptions. I understand this is a gradual process."

Duffey cannot predict any better than any student or administrator just how long he will stay. At best, he makes this analogy:

"When you're married and someone asks you how long you plan to stay married -- how would you answer?"

Anne Wexler speaks on the role of 'today's woman'

People hesitate sometimes when addressing Anne Wexler in the presence of her husband.

Is it "Mrs. Duffey?" No, that would be her mother. And it is certainly not "Anne."

"Ms. Anne Wexler" is what people usually call her. And it's accurate, for it exemplifies the independence for which she is known.

Born in New York and raised in Connecticut, Wexler began her career in politics by serving on the Democratic town committee in Westport, Conn., and later as town chairman and on the town zoning board.

POLITICAL MOVER--Anne Wexler has been considered a mover and a shaker in both Connecticut and national government since the Johnson presidency.

Wexler worked for Lyndon Johnson in 1964, and two years later, managed one of the first congressional antiwar campaigns.

In 1970, Wexler was one of two women in the country managing U.S. Senate campaigns. Her candidate, Joseph Duffey, upset the Democratic incumbent, Thomas Dodd, and won the primary. Duffey lost a three-way general election to Lowell Weiker.

In 1976, Wexler served as floor leader for President Jimmy Carter at the Democratic convention. Under Carter, Wexler also served as deputy undersecretary of commerce.

In 1981, Wexler left her political life in order to found the political consulting firm of Wexler and Associates. In early 1983, Nancy Clark Reynolds joined the firm as president and top partner, and the firm's name was changed to Wexler, Reynolds Harrison and Schule, Inc.

She is now, according to Working Woman magazine, "the closest thing today to a woman in the private sector with political influence through her government connections."

She sits in her kitchen with a cup of black coffee and her feet up on a chair next to her.

"You really ought to see the NY Times this morning. It's a good issue. On the Op-Ed page, they're talking about the situation in Grenada," she says.

Over coffee, she talks about her career, her success, her roles as a woman -- the latter a far different definition from what is expected from an administrator's wife.

"I think that every woman leader must be a feminist," Wexler said.

She said she believes in the principle of always being concerned about the women who are coming behind her, and being sure that people are concerned for women's rights.

"It's the small things you have to raise people's consciousnesses about," Wexler said.

"I was invited to a meeting on an advisory committee, and I am the only woman on the committee for this particular institution. They were having the meeting in New York next week at a club that doesn't admit women. So, I just called up and said 'I'm not going. You should be sensitive enough not to have meetings in places like this.' So they changed the meeting."

Wexler, 53, said we live in a society that puts a high premium on credentials -- and women, she said, "are just beginning to become credentialled.

"It's not easy out there," she said.

Wexler, a self-proclaimed feminist, defines today's gender gap as having to do with women's attitudes toward politics, politicians and national issues.

Wexler said there is no question about the fact that women feel very strongly about certain issues that have to do with economic equity and social issues in general.

"People who don't recognize the gender gap...politicians, I think...will suffer the consequences because it is very real," she said.

She sees the current administration as having a problem with the gender gap.

"You just have to look at who runs things in Washington," she said. "The White House is predominantly male," with the exception of Jean Kirkpatrick however, who is "respected and listened to."

"There are some pretty good role models in the Reagan administration," she said. "Who fight for recognition of women all the time...Margaret Heckler and Elizabeth Dole certainly both do."

'...They were having a meeting in New York at a club that doesn't admit women. ...I said "I'm not going. You should be sensitive enough not to have meetings in places like this." So they changed the meeting. ...'
--Anne Wexler

Wexler sees her generation as a transition from tokenism to the real world.

"One of the things that has always been hard for women is the translating in the minds of men...the benefits of volunteer experience."

Wexler's own expertise has come from her volunteer work and past jobs in the government.

"The bedrock of volunteer groups in the country are women. And they don't just stuff envelopes and ring door bells anymore," Wexler said.

"It's part of the discipline of what I do, and the kind of life I lead more than anything else. You get used to it after a while.

"But," she added, "you pay a price for it in personal time."

As if on cue, the chancellor, who on weekends is just plain Joe Duffey, emerges from an adjoining room. Husband and wife are out for an afternoon walk.

SPRINGFIELD SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Sunday, November 13
Fine Arts Center

By JILL HALSTEAD
Collegian Correspondent

Trumpet virtuoso Maurice Andre, together with the Springfield Symphony Orchestra, delighted a smallish audience at the Fine Arts Center Sunday night. The audience responded positively to the first piece, Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 5 in D major, which spotlighted harpsichordist Lory Wallfisch, violinist Masako Yanagita, and flutist William Wittig. Conductor Robert Gutter was obviously jubilant with this Baroque piece that welcomed the audience merrily. It was clear, however, when the bouncy, burly, wizard burst onto the stage for Haydn's Concerto for Trumpet and Orchestra in E-flat major, that he was the premier concern of the audience. Andre, described as "the reigning prince of trumpet music" by Time, is sure to reign for a long time to come. His "perfect" timing, wind control, and intonational precision was pleasantly overwhelming. The Haydn concerto was played gracefully by the orchestra and provided a prime backdrop for the whiffing trumpet. This piece was applauded vigorously and Andre obliged with a short encore. During intermission a collage of critiques could be overheard from around me, all were positive.

The second half of the program began with Marcello's Concerto in D-major. Here again, Andre proved himself a master, this time of another smaller horn. The full orchestra returned as did the harpsichord; together the sound flourished. Unfortunately, this was the end of Andre. The last piece, Mozart's Serenade No. 9 Posthorn in D major, was highlighted by the wind section which performed with delicate certainty. This last piece was long and Andre's charisma was noticeably absent. The orchestra and Andre performed co-operatively and created an enjoyable musical evening.

Dylan aspires for heroic voice

INFIDEL (Columbia)
Bob Dylan

By CHARLES FRANCIS CARROLL
Collegian Staff

Infidels is Bob Dylan's 27th record in a career spanning twenty years for the balladeer-bard, a career marked by as many disappointments as achievements. Infidels is no exception.

The collection of eight songs is the result of two months of recording. All eight on the album are new, but they total little more than forty minutes of playing time. And it has been two years since Dylan's last album.

"Jokerman"is the album's first track and it may be the most complex song on it. Dylan for you. Speaking out at you, but actually he is speaking reflexively about himself. "Jokerman" signals more ambitious lyrics on Infidels; it also signals a purer sound than ever, almost commercial, but for the off-setting beat of Sly Dunbar on drums.

But it's Dylan. The Voice, the Message, The legendary folk poet is still delivering, and after all is said, sung and done, he is consistent, and consistently good.

No, you argue. He's changed; the Folk Dylan, the Rock Dylan, the Country Dylan, the Disco Dylan. Why he's even converted to Christianity. Changed? He's flipped!

Not so, I say. The so-called shifts in his music reflect the swerving currents of pop music; the so-called changes in Dylan reflect the personal vicissitudes of a maturing man. Dylan has always been concerned with religion. His conversion to Christianity demonstrates an expanding consciousness, not a radical change. If anything Dylan on Infidels is reasserting himself, reaffirming his ideals. The album announces a return to authentic Dylan motifs.

"Sweetheart Like You" confirms Dylan as a romantic, and six years since The Rolling Thunder Review and two years since Shot of Love, Dylan continues to heal and gain confidence in his love lyrics, regaining the intensity of the late Sixties, and yet revealing greater experience in this wistful, bluesy ballad.

But it is the social critique of songs like the next one, "The Neighborhood Bully," which most dramatically indicate Dylan's return to form. Isn't that what everyone has been waiting for? Dylan has made the political world personal for people for over two decades. It might be that he is now aspiring to even greater heights. "The Neighborhood Bully" is a reference to the terrorism of tyranny throughout the world and traces it to our leaders who behave like bullies. A rock and roll parody of power, a la punk

The final song on the first side, "License to Kill," is a rock-blues number featuring rolls of gospel piano by Alan Clark and Ecclesiastic tonalities on organ presumably played by Dylan. The song questions the mores of a patriarchal society and its predilection for war from the perspective of a woman. It is significant for Dylan who must reconcile his own private experiences with women through these larger public statements.

The opening number on the second side takes you askance by questioning the motives of the "Man of Peace." It is not all that surprising, however, with the way the word "peace" is used in today's doublespeak. Those who don't like Dylan's religiosity will find this tune far too moralizing, but it does display the guitar talents of Mick Taylor, Mark Knoffler, and Dylan working together perfectly.

"Man of Peace" sets the mood for what I think is the album's most exciting piece, "Union Sundown." These are Ginsbergian rhymes lashing out at both sides of the established order. Dylan defends the worker and attacks management in the manner of Woodie Guthrie, but decrying the failure of the unions and the injustice of the system. Dylan's words echo lyrically in the folk tradition and musically in the idiom of contemporary fusion. Backed by a driving guitar rhythm and Clydie King's supporting vocals, Dylan's voice has never sounded better.

The next cut, "I and I," seems like a lost track from the Slow Train Coming album although it is somewhat more refined with a crisper melody behind Dylan's haunting words. An introspective tune with some more nice guitar licks, it's best as it fades out to the album's closing song, "Don't Fall Apart On Me Tonight," another potential popular hit. It's just tongue-in-cheek enough to not be overbearing, as are some of Dylan's sentimental songs.

Although I dig Dylan's love songs, they are not why I listen to Dylan. I listen for his philosophical views. The achievement of Infidels is the re-emergence of Dylan as a political artist. Dylan is getting off of himself again and speaking up for a common humanity, not solely for the individual. Addressing large issues makes the meaning more accessible to the masses and Infidels has popular appeal.

The strength of the album may also be its weakness. Dylan is still not completely comfortable with his voice and it could be because of his words. His is the frustration of a poet trying to write to music; metaphors over-extended to the point of obscurity in a redundant rhythm. There is a serious question whether or not a song lyric can be true poetry, that is spoken word. Ferlinghetti says no. Furthermore, Dylan aspires poetically to the heroic voice, a difficult task.

There are those who will counter that Dylan's lyrics are good poetry, hence his inclusion in several anthologies. I say contemporary music has yet to contribute a great poet. Infidels is about as close as it gets.

The B-52's are gonna' plant one big whammy-kiss on the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall Thursday night. The show begins at 8 p.m. and good seats are still available. So get out of that state, get out of that state you're in Bread & Circus is out to prove that an

needn't be expensive

A NATURAL THANKSGIVING DINNER

Back when the Pilgrims sat down to their first Thanksgiving feast, they didn't have to worry about such things as artificial colorings and flavorings, refined sugars or chemical additives. Well, neither do you — not if you buy your turkey and all the "fixin's" at Bread & Circus Natural Food Supermarket.

What you'll find here is everything you need to create a memorable Thanksgiving dinner, minus all of the chemical substances that don't belong in anything you eat. And to make it as easy as possible for you to have a natural Thanksgiving, Bread & Circus is offering some very special prices.

FRESH TURKEY

Our turkeys are fed with a rich diet — a mixture of high gluten corn and soybean. They've never been frozen, they receive no injections of sodium solution, antibiotics or growth hormones and they qualify for the USDA "minimally processed" classification. Low in cholesterol and high in protein, our turkeys range from 10 to 24 pounds each and we guarantee that every one of them is fresh and delectable.

Special price: 79¢/lb

Native APPLES

This week, we're offering five different kinds of apples at the same special price: MacIntosh, Delicious, Golden Delicious, Courtland and Imperial. Apples contain many healthy minerals: magnesium, iron and potassium. They're also high in pectin (which aids digestion). Beside all that, they have a wonderfully crisp and fruity taste.

Special price: 59¢/lb

Genuine SWISS CHEESE

Our Swiss cheese is the real thing — it's imported from Switzerland. And unlike many other Swiss cheeses, it contains no sugars, no artificial flavoring or coloring and no preservatives or other chemical additives. It's the best quality Swiss we've ever found and, we think the best-tasting, too.

Special price: $2.69/lb

Budweiser BEER

Budweiser is one of the few popular American beers made entirely from natural ingredients — with no chemical additives and no artificial anything. This week, we're offering it at an almost unheard-of price. If you're a beer-drinker and a Bud-lover, this is the time to stock up.

Special price: $9.49/case (24–12 oz cans)

WHAT IS A "NATURAL FOOD SUPERMARKET"?

Natural food supermarkets combine healthy, chemical-free natural foods with a supermarket's breadth of selection and pricing policies. In addition to natural foods, they also sell everything else a supermarket should carry: paper goods, cleaning supplies, vitamins and cosmetics, pet food, etc., so that you can do all of your shopping in a single store.

Natural food supermarkets are a new idea, but they're springing up all over America. They're meeting a growing demand from men and women who are convinced that eating food without chemicals or artificial ingredients is important to their continuing good health.

The Bread & Circus store in Hadley is America's largest natural food supermarket. We offer a remarkably wide selection of the finest natural foods on the market today and at truly sensible prices. And we won't sell what we don't believe in. We genuinely care about what you eat.

Chico Sans RICE CAKES

These big, round, puffy crackers are great with soups, or perfect with jams, nut butters or other spreads. They're light, they're extremely nutritious, yet remarkably low in calories.

Special Offer: Buy two packages, get the third one free

Massachusetts-Grown CRANBERRIES

What better complement to piping hot turkey than fresh cranberries grown right here in Massachusetts? Their tangy sweetness is a Thanksgiving tradition. And to make sure they're affordable, we're having a sale on the best cranberries on the market.

Special price: 69¢/lb

FARM FRESH MILK

On sale this week: Dell Dale's farm fresh milk, both homogenized and non-homogenized (Creamline). This milk comes from a special herd of gram-fed Holstein cows that are given no hormones or other stimulants. It contains no preserved vitamins and it's pasturized at low temperatures, so the cream doesn't melt down. We think it's better for you — and better tasting — than any other milk on the market.

Special price: $1.89/gal

OUR PRICE POLICY

We believe natural foods don't have to be expensive and we intend to prove it. Our pricing policy begins with a search for the best natural food available. Once we find it, we use the purchasing power of the Bread & Circus chain to buy as much as we can at the lowest possible price. Then we pass the savings on to you.

Can you buy cheaper food elsewhere? Yes, but not much cheaper. Can you buy top quality natural food anywhere else at prices lower than we offer every day? Almost impossible. And our specials are even harder to beat.

Puerto Rico's role in Grenada cited

By YADIRA BETANCES
Collegian Staff

The U.S. military invasion of Grenada has raised many questions and much concern in Puerto Rico where plans and preparations for the invasion were molded since 1979, said Jorge Rodriguez-Beruff, consultant for the Caribbean Project for Justice and Peace in San Juan Puerto Rico who spoke recently at the University of Massachusetts.

Rodriguez-Beruff said the invasion was exercised in Puerto Rico at least four times before the actual one took place in Grenada. The most important of the four was Ocean Venture-82, a "hypothesis" of the Grenadian invasion practiced between April and May of 1982 in the Puerto Rican island of Vieques.

The Caribbean Basin Initiative, a political strategy of the U.S. was also instrumental in the invasion of Grenada, he said. The plan, was presented in the U.S. mainly as "an economic and political plan for destabilization in the region," he said.

Rodriguez-Beruff also pointed out how Reagan protested against accusations of formulating a military policy along with an economic policy for the region.

"He (Reagan) said 'no-no, the main elements were economic aid, trade, investment, etcetera and the military aspect was very secondary.' Now it's quite clear that the main element was military and the secondary ones were economics and politics," he said.

Puerto Rico played a central role in the Grenadian invasion, Rodriguez-Beruff said. One of the most obvious signs of Puerto Rico's involvement in the invasion was the opening of Ramier's Field, a former Air Force base closed since 1973 and used to refuel planes and other military apparatus during the invasion.

Caribbean troops passed through Rooster's Road, "the largest U.S. naval facility in the Caribbean and possibly in the world," he said. The U.S. also used Puerto Rico as a "rearback", when wounded U.S. and Cuban soldiers were transported to Rooster's Road and the Veteran Administration Hospital in San Juan, he said.

The national guard of Puerto Rico has been training troops from Barbados, Dominica, St. Lucia and Jamaica since 1979, he said. Rodriguez-Beruff also said at least since 1982, the police force used to control the masses after the invasion were trained in Puerto Rico.

Puerto Rico, Rodriguez-Beruff said, is a "place with a large military concentration." In 1982, the U.S. transferred a major navy communication installation which communicated with naval forces in the Caribbean from Panama to Puerto Rico. This communication base was established in the town of Aguada near Ramier's Air Force base.

Despite U.S. and Puerto Rico plans made in 1973 to reduce military bases in Puerto Rico, the U.S. government have increased them, he said. For example, Fort Allen, where the Haitian refugees were kept, was to become a prison but the U.S. gave it to the U.S. Army Reserve, the National Guard of Puerto Rico and to the U.S. Navy "to jointly use the base for military purposes" after the Haitians left, he said.

Before the Grenadian invasion, Rodriguez-Beruff said, the U.S. Navy agreed with the Puerto Rican government's methods to solve the unemployment problem in Vieques. Sixty percent of the population is unemployed, he said. The U.S. Navy helped resolve the problem, "by attracting defense-related industries that would absorb unemployment," he said.

"If they are successful in Vieques, perhaps we should turn over the whole economic management of Puerto Rico to the Navy so they can bring in more factories," he said.

Panel on Africa held at UMass

By CAMDEN PIERCE
Collegian Staff

The problems of poverty and civil violence in the Horn of Africa were the topics of a panel discussion at the University of Massachusetts Monday night.

Encompassing Somalia, Djibouti and Ethiopia, the Horn of Africa was described by the panelists as a region of immense strategic importance to world super-powers, and a region marred by a bloody history of exploitation and rebellion.

"Those who commit violence deny the problem, and as the problem is exposed they say they're not responsible for their actions," said Dr. Hussein A. Dulham, a West-Somalian presently studying clinical psychology at Boston University. He said the problems of the region could only be understood when put into an historical context.

Since the late 19th century, Britain, France, Italy and Ethiopia have "committed all forms of colonial atrocities" on the people of Western Somalia, according to Dulham. He said the problems of West-Somalia were the same as those facing other people in the Horn of Africa. "No talk of great ideas can approach the human problem...if people continue to blind themselves to it," he said.

Prof. Alem Habtu, an Ethiopian now at Queens College in New York City, said that by jockying for influence in the Horn of Africa, the United States and the Soviet Union "have become the instruments of local actors in the Horn."

The Soviet Union has given an estimated $2 billion in military aid to Ethiopia, while the U.S. has located a Rapid Deployment Strike Force in Somalia, Habtu said.

Because of cycles of drought, during any given year 5 million of the 33 million Ethiopian people will experience famine, according to Habtu.

Yet, "In the war economy scarce resources are geared to war, and at least half of the budget is expended on military related acts," he said. Super-powers have been unwilling to invest economic aid in the region because of civil strife, Habtu said.

Dr. Bereket Habte Sellassie, an Eritrian teaching at Howard University in Washington D.C., said much of the Ethopian military budget has been spent trying to quell the Eritrean rebellion in eastern Ethiopia. For the past twenty years Eritrians have been struggling for self-determination, Sellassie said.

Though Sellassie thought the ideal solution to the Eritrean problem should be sought via a meaningful dialogue, he dismissed the possibility as apparently unrealistic. "A state formed by violence can only be transformed by violence...Arguments are now being fought in the battlefield," Sellassie said.

Applications now being taken for Black Affairs' Associate editor for the Spring semester. Applications are available 9 a.m.—4 p.m., Monday through Friday in room 113 in the Campus Center. Deadline is 4 p.m. December 1, 1983. The Collegian is an equal opportunity employer.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

Outrage often misdirected

Perhaps I find it increasingly difficult to keep things in perspective nowadays. Events occur so quickly around the world with such intensity and with such emotionality that oftentimes my only reaction to them is frustration: frustration that they're too far away or too close to home and frustration that I'm not able to do anything about them or influence them in any way. As I watch the news, I think to myself: "What a waste, surely there's got to be a better way." Yet I do not know what that better way is, nor do I know what I can do to stop the death of men my own age on land that is so distant.

Howard Axelrod

I certainly do not advocate a passive, apathetic student body insensitive to the world's ever-changing events. However, as I watched UMass students objecting to U.S. policies in Lebanon and Grenada, I honestly couldn't help but think that what they were doing was nothing more than a futile exercise in student radicalism that had no chance for any tangible results directly or indirectly from their actions.

There are too many problems right in our own backyard that do have the potential for achievable results and obtainable solutions. These problems are not in El Salvador or Grenada--they are on our campus and they demand our attention.

There is an embarrassing contrast to the libraries at Mt. Holyoke and Amherst College to our facility at UMass. The storage-like reading rooms in Goodell are uncomfortable to sit in, poorly-lit to read in, and certainly uninspiring to study in. The 26-story monument in the center of the campus, the "Tower" serves only as a humiliating reminder to wasted state funds and misdirected student fees.

The student senate should be utilized for student matters, not for resolutions condemning U.S. foreign policies in Grenada. These kinds of resolutions do the general student body no good, and I do not believe that they represent the needs of the students they were elected to represent. Perhaps they should focus attention toward the intentions of a student fee or tuition increase. I would propose, for example, that if Chancellor Duffey had specified that a particular increase was specifically for the improvement of the library facilities at UMass i.e. the elusive reopening of the library tower, instead of an ambiguous general increase, he would have received more support. Even a student on financial aid and one putting him/herself through school, like myself, could accept such a specific proposal and relinquish that hard-earned $50. It's that important.

We should examine the poor conditions of some of the rooms in Herter and Bartlett Halls: places that are crying for some attention. We should ask ourselves why students only make these places worse through malicious destruction, hence skyrocketing building maintainence costs and only resulting in security measures that necessarily, but unfortunately, limit the use of much needed study space.

It seems to me that student outrage and monies should be directed toward these issues and goals. In a period when money is tight and the University trustees and Board of Regents are looking for alumni contributions, it only makes sense that something as primary and central to a large state university as a library should receive priority funding to increase and improve study space and to once and for all reopen the library tower which only serves as an embarrassment to the entire university community. Hold a rally for that, and I might not only participate, I might even volunteer to lead it.

Acceptance of diversity important

I'm angry. I'm angry because it's so painful to be homosexual. Painful only because our world, our society makes it so painful. It needn't be! It's wrong that I should have to read filth on bathroom walls often suggesting execution of gay people. It's tasteless of people, especially students, to blurt out "queer jokes" without wondering whether or not they are offending some one. It is quite disheartening to hear them from acquaintances and even friends who just don't know better.

Richard Vigeant

Friends. I've seen so many straight male friends fade out of my life because of anxieties they hold; "Oh, God, I better not be too nice to him or he might come on to me, etc." Ridiculous. It has gotten to the point where I avoid the truth at times to save friendships. Are they really worth saving? Fortunately, most of my female friends have been quite empathetic and just generally wonderful. I suppose there is something quite endearing about a sensitive man. And I am sensitive. How could I not be, living a life on the defensive?

An anxiety I often feel is that I don't measure up as a man. That's another thing I'm angry about. I shouldn't have to feel that way, ever. But I am human and I do. Considering what I'm surrounded by and what I grew up with, it's not surprising. My parents "sheltered" me from any information about homosexuals other than that they were strange and to be feared.

Relatives still wonder when I'll get a girlfriend or even married. I had no positive role models to view on television. We never saw "one of them" on The Brady Bunch or The Partridge Family. And church! I grew up Catholic! Catholics are supposed to get married and make babies. There's no room for sexual "deviants." In short, I have listened to people telling me to suppress a crucial part of me my whole life. Absurd.

There are so many other things that I'm upset about. It's apalling that supposed educated congressmen refer to people with a homosexual preference as "fags" and "lesbos." I'm disgusted that some think AIDS is funny and even deserved. I doubt it will ever be acceptable for me to hold the hand of someone I love in public. I'm angry that I had to spend a great deal of time wondering whether or not I should sign this. I'm angry mostly because I'd like not to be angry.

BOG is much more than a title

The Campus Center is one of the three central campus facilities servicing residents, students and the immediate campus community.

The Campus Center is designed to provide service to all segments of the students with equal priority. Its services, activities and facilities encourage informal and extended learning as well as relaxed and rewarding human interaction. It is an essential part of the social context of the multi-ethnic community and must continue to provide its own unifying force.

Brad Jacobs

We, the Board of Governors, will always respond to individuals and groups from varied and diverse backgrounds when planning and executing new services and new programs in and about the Campus Center. But it's hard to respond or plan when we don't hear from you. In the past, the student body had been a valuable resource for the Board of Governors. We received great input, resulting in a number of services that were provided. Because of student interest, the board ensures all increases in fees and retail prices are justified. We certify vendors who wish to sell items on the concourse. We provide food and room waivers for qualifying organizations. We operate a key function which is responsible for distributing the keys to all student organizations in the Complex. The Board of Governors also funds many groups providing services to UMass. But the present students just don't seem that concerned. Student lounge space on the ninth floor was taken away without so much as a grumble.

This year the student fee looks like it is going to go through the roof, but not one ill-spoken word has been expressed as of yet. Student Co-ops are being buried by the powers of Whitmore and the Campus Center Administration. Students would normally expect support from the Administration, after all, their fee is supporting the building. But the co-ops and student run businesses that operate in the Campus Center don't seem to be aware, or just don't mind the adversarial attitude prevailing within the University Administration. The powers that are at Whitmore and in the CC Complex, are more interested in burying the student businesses than supporting their efforts and students are now seeming to accept this. We mustn't allow the Administration to do what they want, when they wish without student input or interest.

The students pay for this building. Each year a student fee, over $80 per year the last three years, is paid toward the retirement of bonds and their principal. Because students pay this fee, they should receive services from this building. It is a student complex, so let's make sure we have input into our building. It is doubtful the average student feels that this money is well spent, but we, the Board, have no reason to assume otherwise if we don't hear about it. Since this is a student-financed building, its primary responsibility is to the students. We will act and react, but we must know what you think, and want.

The Campus Center is truly a community center with a myriad of services designed to meet the diverse needs of a heterogenous clientele. We, the Board of Governors, take an interest in all the entities, problems, and issues in the Campus Center/Student Union; we only wish the general populace would be concerned enough to do the same.

Why we should fast

The first question the reader may ask is "who are we?". "We" are a group of UMass students that discuss hunger-related issues. We want to sharpen our understanding of these important issues and the ability to articulate them. We have joined this group, because we realized that not all people on earth have a living standard comparable to ours and that there is a connection between our prosperous "American way of life" and the peril of so many others in remote areas of the world. Some of us joined the group because we felt concerned when comparing the offerings in our dining commons to the food an infant is offered in Northern Thailand, in Ethiopia, in Northern Brazil and in many more countries. We were alarmed in discovering that a dog held by an American family gets more meat to eat weekly than many individuals in several Asian and African countries, and appalled that one of Brazil's major export products is crushed grain. Annually at least 400,000 children are dying of starvation in Brazil.

As members of the UMass Hunger Task Force each of us has decided that to talk about these problems is not enough. Each of us felt that it is necessary to move, to set off to do some work in favor of the poorest of the poor. 40,000 people die of starvation each day according to UNICEF. It is high time that this scandal of the twentieth century is brought to an end.

It is true that we alone cannot change the overall situation, but it is equally true that the situation cannot be changed unless each of us takes responsibility for these human fellows being in peril.

That is the major reason for our fasting on Thursday, November 17. We will not eat one day long and will thus try to sense what it feels like to be without food. In turn the money that is spared because of our fasting will be donated to OXFAM AMERICA. OXFAM is an international development and disaster relief organization based in Boston. OXFAM AMERICA was founded in 1970 and is one of six autonomous OXFAMS, including two in Canada and one each in Great Britain, Australia and Belgium.

Every student and faculty member is cordially invited to participate in the group and or the fast. Each will be a substantial contribution to decreasing the number of starving people - the most important goal of our days. We have an information table each Tuesday in the Campus Center and are happy to talk to everybody who is interested in this most important work.

Students can make the difference

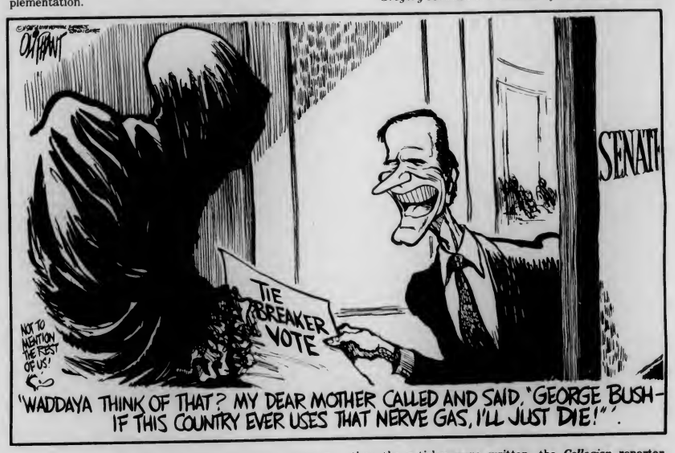
As a member of the Undergraduate Student Senate's Public Policy committee, I would like to thank all those students who wrote their state senators in opposition to raising the drinking age. The Massachusetts Senate rejected the motion by a 27 to 7 margin. Student lobbying of the state senate played an important role in influencing the vote. Public Policy committee members delivered over 750 letters from University of Massachusetts students, to the state senate, expressing opposition to raising the drinking age. Students from this university, and other universities and colleges in the state, organized and effectively lobbied the legislature for defeat of the motion. Student lobbying was an effective method implemented in persuading the state legislature against raising the drinking age.

Gregory Madden



There are many other issues, directly affecting students, that come before the legislature, the Board of Trustees, the Board of Regents, and the administration; but often students' interests and concerns are not addressed. The problem is that students' voices are not heard, as was the case with the drinking age and proposed tuition hike, their interests and concerns are listened to and have an effect on decision-making policy and implementation.

The Public Policy committee currently has filed three bills before the state legislature. One is to place a student on the Board of Regents, a second is to put students on the UMass Building Authority, and a third is to put fines collected by the student Attorney General from shoplifters at the University Store, into an emergency financial aid account at the University. The first two bills deal directly with giving students a voice on governing bodies which control the university. The third takes fines paid by UMass students and returns the money to UMass students.

Any of these bills could be passed if state legislators are effectively lobbyed by students. As a fellow student I ask you to become involved. It is not necessary to become involved in every issue, just think about one over which you are particularly concerned, whether it be rent control, the tuition hike, the proposed Curry Hicks renovation fee, or any other student issue. There are 23,000 students at UMass and if everyone speaks up the students' voice will finally be heard. Students have rights and one of those is the right to be heard and with student involvement we will be heard and achieve true student empowerment.

As a member of the Public Policy committee I ask you to stop by the Public Policy table outside the Hatch and find out what you can do to help yourself. Once again, thanks for making yourselves heard on the drinking age issue and point to it as an example of students' power to make policies that concern them reflect what they truly feel.

Abuse of political power . . .

To the Editor,

About three weeks ago, I began to read of S.G.A. Co-President Charlene Allen's predicament of not receiveing financial aid. Day after day I fell victim to the repetition of her quote that she would be forced to acquire a forty-hour-per-week job to finance her education, thus she would have no alternative but to resign from office. I would like to point out to Ms. Allen, that many students must work while at school in order to finance their education. I feel she misused the power associated with her position, by manipulating the Collegian in to helping her pressure the Financial Aid office to render an appeal in her favor.

No other student at the university is allowed to use the press to publish the fact they have been denied financial aid; and there are many in the same situation. What has happened is similar to all facets of politics, at any level; the powerful use and abuse their powers. Ms. Allen is not alone in what she has done.

However, I think it is only fair that a university, when dealing with students (which Ms. Allen is), give ALL students equal treatment despite any positions they may hold. This is not a personal vendetta against Ms. Allen. Rather, it is a statement to display my displeasure in the uses and abuses of political power.

Keith M. Sherman

. . .does little for rest of us

To the Editor,

Well folks, she's done it. Our co-president seems to feel that her instate tuition will be granted and if she were just a regular student I'd be very happy for her. Or even if she approached the matter in a different fashion. I would still have been happy for her but she didn't and that's why I am appalled.

In case you've missed things let me update you. Three weeks ago one of our co-presidents realized (mid-semester?) that she would no longer be able to afford school unless she stepped down from her position as co-president and got a 40-hr/wk job. "Oh my, but she's too valuable" we were all supposed to cry. "How could we get along with out her."

Apparently some people felt this way and let the appropriate people know. For her status will soon be changed to that of an "in-state" student.

So why am I ripped? Because what she did was use her position as president and all the powers that come with it (i.e. media coverage, front page stories of her predicament that reached tens of thousands of students and administrators) in order to attain (here's the kicker) a personal exemption.

Come now, Ms. Allen, have you forgotten why you were elected? If so, let me remind you that the student body elected you to, among other things, make changes in a sometimes unfair educational system. Which means, that if you really felt that you were being mistreated then you should have used your powers as president to change the appeals process and not just find a convenient loophole in which to slither through.

Our side has been ignored

To the Editor,

This letter is in response to the two articles published in the Collegian on November 8th and 9th. These articles refer to complaints about Building Operations' workers allegedly harassing women as they walk through the corridor near the C.C. barber shop. There are a number of points we feel must be addressed regarding both the articles themselves and the issues they pertain to.

As far as the journalism involved in these stories is concerned, we can only say it was extremely unprofessional. In both articles, only the assistant manager of Building Operations was interviewed (and in one article was inaccurately described as "director of Building Operations"). He was quoted as saying he had discussed the issue with the workers, and as a result the men, "decided not to sit there."

Two things should be pointed out here. First of all, at the time the articles were written, the Collegian reporter made no attempts to verify what the assistant manager said to the workers. If she had, she would have discovered that NO SUCH DISCUSSION EVER TOOK PLACE. And secondly, the reporter NEVER even talked to ANY of the workers about whom the articles were written. Is the Collegian afraid to speak with workers on this campus? If the reporter had bothered to speak with us at the time, she would have learned that most of us have been spending our break time in our "break room" and not sitting in the hallway near the barber shop.

The issue that most upsets us however, is the charges concerning sexual harassment. The articles serve to convey the message that all workers (in this case first shift Building Operations workers) are leering, whistling sexual deviants. This is a gross injustice to all working people. Sexual harassment is a serious matter, and should not be trivialized as was done in the Collegian articles. We do not deny the fact that sexual harassment takes place in this hallway (as it does everywhere, on and off campus, and by all types of men--students, professionals, etc.). Unfortunately, the manner in which the articles were written generalize all of us as harassing women. This is simply not true. There is now a sexual harassment grievance procedure on this campus to redress this kind of behavior. Any woman who feels she has been harassed by an individual or individuals should use this vehicle to stop such actions. To condemn an entire group of people for the actions of a few is irresponsible and unfair to all.

The editors of the Collegian who chose to give these articles front-page exposure should do some soul-searching. This type of journalism represents an anti-worker mentality which is too often seen in our major press publications. It is unfortunate that young, aspiring journalists would perpetuate the same myths and stereotypes of workers that their established counterparts in the "real" world have done. For shame!

Sports Log

By TONY BETROS
Collegian Staff

Just a few thoughts...

After 11 weeks of the NFL season, only Pittsburgh looks like the clear-cut winner so far. Everything else is a dog fight. The schizophrenic New England Patriots probably played their best defensive game of the year in beating the Dolphins 17-6, highlighted by another 4th down, goal-line stand. The big question is this coming weekend as they take on Cleveland, a team that they should beat. Will it be Dr. Jekyll or Mr. Hyde?...I finally found a cure for insomnia. Just watch a Monday Night Football game with the Giants. That'll put you in a deep, deep sleep. I must admit, I did stay up for the Giants-Cardinals 20-20 debacle. I couldn't stop laughing.

Baseball season may be over, but it still makes the news, thanks mostly to the free agent draft last week. The Red Sox showed interest in left-handed hitting first basemen Warren Cromartie, Darrell Evans, and Oscar Gamble. The Sox need that good left-hander in the wake of the Captain's retirement...Watch out for Steinbrenner. He's got two big moves in the works. One is a deal to obtain Montreal's Gary Carter. The other is to fire Billy Martin so he can re-sign Goose Gossage, who has indicated that he doesn't want to play under Martin.

Turning to the NBA, the Celtics are the best team in basketball right now. A huge factor is Dennis Johnson. He has given the C's defense in the backcourt, where they have sorely needed it. It looks again like the Sixers and Lakers will be the only other top-notch teams as parity has hit pro hoop as well as pro football.

Boston fans are sitting quite high thank you as the Bruins also hold top honors in the Adams division. Their 12-4-1 record also sports an unbeaten mark at home, with Buffalo and Quebec being their closest rivals...Don't let Edmonton fool you. Sure, they have Gretzky--you know him, gets player of the week, every week--but they really don't have too tough a division. It's like Nebraska playing the Yankee Conference.

Speaking of Nebraska, what a game it will be as the Huskers take on Miami down in the Orange Bowl. The Texas-Georgia Cotton Bowl matchup should also be a classic. It's a shame Nebraska and Texas won't play, although I've heard of a proposal to have the first and second ranked teams square off after the bowls are over for about one million dollars each. Not a bad incentive...It's too bad BC lost, for their chance for the Fiesta Bowl has slimmed. But give credit to them for building up the program from mediocrity a few years ago. I wish they would do the same in certain other colleges.

Finally, this one goes in the last but certainly not least dep't: The UMass women's sports are telling everybody else what final four means as the soccer and field hockey teams travel to Florida and Pennsylvania this weekend. What would be even better is beating UConn in the finals of both sports. A national champion sounds good in any sport.

Minuteman fans may get to see more of senior Craig Smith than they have in the past. A starter when he was a freshman, the 6'4" skywalker didn't see much action under McLaughlin, but Gerlufsen sees Smith helping out tremendously on the defensive end.

"Craig has tremendous quickness and he will help us defensively," Gerlufsen said. "We want to make more things happen defensively this year. Last year we packed the zone in but this year we'd like to change defenses more and try to get some easy hoops off our defense."

One man UMass fans won't see this year is Darryl Carter. D.C. had some academic problems last semester and took this semester off but will come back to school in January. According to Gerlufsen, Carter will spend his time in the classroom instead of on the court when he does return. This will not only bring Carter's grades up but it will also allow him three more full years of eligibility.

Gerlufsen may also call on junior guard Hal Shaw, freshman walk on John King and sophomore transfer Jackie Sheehan, who will become eligible in January.

Stevens aims high for hoop team

By RUSS WHINNEM
Collegian Staff

The lady has so often been a winner. As a player at Bridgewater State to the coach at Clark University, the victories have outnumbered the losses. And by a large margin.

Now the show steps up to Division One for the new University of Massachusetts women's basketball coach, Barbara Stevens, where she will try to turn around a squad that finished at a dismal 5-22 last season.

"In every area she was what we felt this university basketball program needed," says Athletic Director Frank McInerny, who "concurred completely" with the selection committee's choice of Stevens to replace well-liked former Coach Mary Ann Odzarski, who resigned last year.

And why not. Stevens brings with her a more than impressive six year 123-42 record at Clark, during which time the team reached the Division III Final Four twice.

Now, sitting back in her new Division I office, Stevens, a native of Southbridge Mass., who's bright eyes and enthusiasm illuminates her personality, talks of focusing on a new year, a new program, and a new level of competition.

"That will probably be the biggest thing for me, getting accustomed to the new level. I'm not familiar with a lot of the teams we'll be playing because many aren't from just around the region that I've coached."

Along with a higher level can also go higher intensity, and Stevens is looking at some areas that she has not had a chance to deal with yet. Scholarships, for instance.

"We never had scholarships at Clark," she says. "The intensity level was a little different than it is here. Hoop was always supposedly second there. Here the girls have a big emphasis on basketball."

"I've got ten full scholarships to work with now." That's up three from previous years. "That was one of my priorities," she adds.

However, just the presence of more scholarship athletes does not transform a team to contention status overnight. Stevens knows this well. "It's going to take time," she begins. "Everyone's got to realize this and be patient. But basically, we've got the same kids and they're ready to change and anxious to win."

Stevens, the captain of Bridgewater State teams in both 1975 and 1976 that she says were "pretty good and played in the regionals," would like to begin that turn around by playing her type of basketball-up tempo and fast moving.

"I like to use fast breaking and pressure defenses. A lot of man to man and that kind of style of play." She realizes, however, that nothing can be forced upon players. She must, in other words, work with what she's got. "It all depends on the personnel," she admits. "I've got to see what the kid's skills are and go from there. Hopefully we'll be able to combine it all and be successfull."

So as Barbara Stevens looks upon her new task, what she wants to do here is the same thing she has done everywhere else, which is to win. Then again, in a different sense, it is more complex to her than that. "We want to win, but it goes much deeper than that. We want to build pride at the same time. I want my players to say when it's over that they were happy to go to UMass and happy to play basketball here."

WINNING SPIRIT--New head coach of the UMass Women's basketball team, Barbara Stevens, has a winning outlook on the season.

Senior Dana Mikesell was first in for UMass. Despite slipping and falling just after the race got underway she finished 32nd overall with a time of 18:01.

Harvard University won the team title, edging out Boston University who placed four runners in the top six but found its fifth teammate in 47th place and finished one point behind the Crimson.

Chris Pratt, Deirdre Doyle, Maureen O'Reilly, Sally Howes, Eileen Kelly, and Traci O'Malley all finished for UMass, bringing to a close a season in which they gained recognition around New England as a group of hard-working competitors with a lot of potential.

Many of the Minutewomen are now appearing for the indoor track season which commences December 10th at the Boston University Relays.

Milestone weekend for women kickers

HEAVY ACTION—Nadia Komarowski keeps her eye on the ball for UMass while Debbie Harackiewicz (8) is ready to attack in the 1-0 quarterfinal victory over Brown.

By GERRY deSIMAS
Collegian Staff

This will be a weekend of milestones for the third seeded University of Massachusetts women's soccer team as it travels to the final four for the first time ever in Orlando, Florida. For the third consecutive season, Coach Kalekeni Banda has led his team into the national playoffs.

These two games will also mark the end of the collegiate careers of senior tri-captains Stacey Flionis, Mary Szetela and Denna Dennault. These three are special to Banda in that they are the first group of seniors he coached from start to finish.

The Minutewomen will have to play better than on Sunday against Brown and their whole game, which is based upon their defense, will have to improve. If the team plays good defense, reasons Banda, the offense will just come.

"The theory is that with a stronger defense," junior back Lori Stukes said, "we can move up quicker and break up counterattacks." The whole team has a defensive outlook which is reflected in the lineup of five backs, three midfielders and two forwards.

The defense was Banda's idea to use. The Italians used this type of defense to win the World Cup in 1982.

"We have to give him a lot of credit," forward Sue Bird said. "He has brought us this far and made us into a national material team."

"He's the best coach I'll ever have," Szetela said, whose thoughts were echoed by Jeanne Paul. In fact, the entire team has enormous respect for its coach.

But as Banda would say, it's the 12 players that do the work and Szetela and Dennault are joined by Stukes, Beth Semonik and Kristi Kelly on an experienced back row, that anchors the team.

"Experience helps," Stukes said. "Less mistakes are made this way. The big key, though, is that this team is of no superstars. "We're balanced very well," said Bird. "This team works so well together. Everybody's contribution helps the team." Everybody is important from high scorer Flionis to freshman Michelle Rodney, who played very well off the bench in the Brown win.

So UMass, which took third in New England three years ago (Banda's first year), seventh in the nation two years ago and fifth last year, faces two time defending champion North Carolina on Saturday.

The Tar Heels are 16-1 but UMass with its defense and team play is ready to go.

"We have a lot of confidence," said Dennault. "We're on top now and we are going to make the most of it."

Field hockey confident as final four approaches

By JILL LANG
Collegian Staff

The NCAA Championship brings to mind visions of national media coverage, top ranked competition and pressure to perform.

For several members of the University of Massachusetts field hockey team, however, there is more to the NCAA tournament than meets the eye.

Sure, the Minutewomen want to come home with the championship trophy, something they have not done in all three trips to the tournament. What more could any team want after winning a national championship?

The answer to that question, according to UMass goalie Patti Shea, is fun.

"Fun is part of the game," Shea said Monday. "If you're playing but you're not having fun, you might as well throw down the equipment and say good-bye."

The stickers have worked hard all season to get where they are today, but it goes even farther than that. Seven members of this season's squad are seniors...this is their last shot at bringing a national championship trophy back to Amherst.

For some of these seniors, making it to the final four in Philadelphia this weekend is just another step on the ladder of their field hockey careers.

"Winning the championship would be the icing on the cake for me," Shea said. "But even if we don't win, I have four good years to look back on, and I know I will have no quarrels."

Senior co-captain Carol Progulske said, "We've all been through a lot together. We know how it feels to lose important games. We want to win for ourselves, but we also want to win for Pam. (Coach Hixon) It's hard to explain. We don't want to lose, but we do want to go out knowing we played the best we could."

The confidence level of the team is high, as it has been all season. The confidence is flowing several ways: between coach and players, players and coach, and amongst the players themselves.

"We're all pretty confident we won't come up short this season," senior Dian Kobel said. "We're peaking now, and this is what we strive for - peaking during the national tournament."

Sophomore Chris Kocot, who was red shirted last season with a broken ankle, is playing in her first NCAA tournament this season.

"We're playing very well right now," Kocot said.

Senior co-captain Chris Coughlin, who is playing in her third NCAA tournament as a UMass field hockey player, said she feels UMass is strong enough to win.

"We have worked very hard to get this far. We have put a lot in, and hopefully, we will get a lot out of it." she said.

Since this all seems to be old hat for some members of the team, what about nervousness?

"It's excitement more than nervousness," Kobel said.

Shea said, "If you're tense, then you can't perform. You have to be confident, but it can't be a nervous confident."

"The NCAA's are a naturally exciting atmosphere," Progulske said. "But I don't get all that nervous...well, maybe a little."

"I think we deserve the title; we've given all we can, and it seems we've never had the breaks. That's one reason we want to win it all the more," she said.

Each of Hixon's players gives 110 percent to the game of field hockey, both on and off the field. This is reflected in their play and in their attitude.

"As long as we come off the field knowing we played our best game, that in itself is a moral victory," Shea said.

UMass hoop to begin season with respectability and spirit

By BILL SHEA
Collegian Staff

Editor's Note - This is the first part of a two-part preview of the 1983-84 University of Massachusetts basketball team which opens the season Saturday night at 7:30 p.m. in the Cage against Yugoslavian National Team.

Minuteman hoop fans will be pleased to hear the "Rage in the Cage" will return for another season.

The fold out picture poster displays familiar faces to UMass hoop fans. Edwin Green slamming home his patented two hand slam, Donald Russell racing the ball up court and John Hempel ripping down a rebound were familiar sites at the Cage last year.

While the faces main relatively the same, this may be quite a different Minuteman squad.

For starters, there's a new head coach in Ron Gerlufsen and Al Wolejko will join Mark Shea as an assistant coach. Gerlufsen replaced Tom McLaughlin who resigned last spring, and the former assistant to McLaughlin has his own ideas on how to utilize his talent. The most important ingredient Gerlufsen wants to instill in his team has nothing to do with offensive plays or defensive sets, but rather, competitive spirit.

"The fans at the Cage really give the players an extra lift," said Gerlufsen, who was very much a part of bringing basketball respectability back to UMass. "But we've got to have the competitiveness on the road that we have at home. We have to be just as willing to take charge on the road as at home."

The Minutemen stumbled to an 0-14 road record mainly because of mental breakdowns which led to numerous turnovers which resulted in blowout losses to St. Peters 90-52 and Temple 91-64, among others.

Gerlufsen hopes he has part of the answer in 5'11" freshman guard Carl Smith. The Fork Union Military graduate will most likely handle the point guard duty with Donald Russell (13.3 ppg last year) moving over to the shooting guard slot.

"Carl will handle the point for us," said Gerlufsen. "When we're pressured he'll handle the ball 85 percent of the time.

Smith possesses great quickness and his presence will take the ballhandling responsibilities off Russell so he can concentrate on putting the ball in the basket.

Last year's starter Ron Young (5.4 ppg) appears to be the odd man out but the 6'4" guard is sure to see his share of minutes and will assume his familiar off guard spot with either Smith or Russell taking over the point.

UMass runners finish eighth

By M.E. MURRAY
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusett's women's cross-country team sloshed their way to an eighth-place finish at the NCAA Division I, District I, qualifying meet Saturday at the University of Vermont.

Neither rain, snow, sleet, or slush could keep the Minutewomen from their appointed task, which they accomplished much to the dismay of the Universities of Rhode Island and Vermont, who finished ninth and tenth respectively.

After losing to those schools early in the year, UMass has improved steadily in the latter stages of the season and has now proved itself to be the better team.

More than 65 women representing 14 schools competed in the event which was held in weather conditions that dictated cautious running. It resulted in slower than normal times over the three mile course.

Student senate could miss Duffey's deadline

By LISA MARIE CANTWELL
Collegian Staff

The ratification of the Student Government Association's revised Constitution will not meet the end of the semester deadline Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey set, and a resolution opposing a bill filed to the state legislature which would raise student fees $20, was passed at last night's Undergraduate Student Senate meeting.

Duffey has threatened to freeze SGA funds if his deadline is not met.

"We are taking a gamble," Jay Flynn, chair of the government affairs committee, said of the senate's decision to wait two weeks before voting on the document.

The final document was not completed until 3 a.m. on Wednesday, and "there has not been enough time for people to go over it," Flynn said. There are also some "mistakes and inconsistencies," which have to be worked out, he stated.

Several SGA members said it is possible that Duffey will withhold his threat to cutoff funds.

"I hope that Duffey sees that we have made constructive progress," Flynn said.

According to the bylaws of the existing constitution, a revision must be approved by four out of the seven residential area governments, and is to remain with those governments for four weeks. The initial approval of the new constitution by the Undergraduate Student Senate is not expected for two weeks, and the area governments will not receive it until then.

Flynn said he expects the final ratification at the first Undergraduate Student Senate meeting in February, after which the document "will go right to the Trustees," he said.

The new constitution is a synthesis of the original constitution, a revised draft completed over the summer by a seven-member SGA committee, and the United Areas Council's input this fall.

"In the spirit of compromise, we came up with the best document, which is what we wanted," said Central Area senator Timothy Rudolph.

The senate last night also approved a resolution opposing a bill filed by Governor Dukakis to the state legislature, which would raise student fees by 20 dollars next semester.

The bill would increase the university's borrowing cap by $20 million, to be used for the renovation of Curry-Hicks Cage and some dormitories.

"This would cause a $350,000 debt increase per year," said Paul Gosselin, chair of public policy, "that would mean a $20 fee per student," he said.

"It is not in the interest of the students to fund the renovation of the Cage in this manner," said Jaime Steriling, a commuter senator on the Rents and Fees committee, which researched the implications and costs of the bill.

Gosselin, along with co-president Charlene Allen and several other senate members, has been lobbying against the bill in Boston periodically since last June.

Handicapped losing access

By JEANETTE DeFORGE
Collegian Correspondent

Side doors recently replaced in Brett dormitory in the Central Residential Area are inaccessible to handicapped students, a problem which may not be resolved until next semester, according to University of Massachusetts Housing officials.

"The lack of dexterity in some students' fingers affects the door pull, making it difficult if not impossible for some students to use," said Daniel Curley, resident director in Brett, one of the few completely accessible dormitories on campus.

Curley said the locks on the doors are also in violation of Massachusetts Handicapped Regulations, chapter 27, part nine which states, "When hardware is provided or changed on doors in the means of egress (entering), levers, push plates, panic hardware, etc. shall be used. All hardware shall be operable with a closed fist."

The handles on the new doors, located on the sides and back of the dormitory, are not operable with a closed fist and the crash bar is too high, Curley said. The main entrance doors have not changed and are still accessible.

"There is no excuse for the lack of accessibility on the doors, given the kind of information that is available on handicapped affairs and regulations," said Donna Folan, a disabled Brett resident. "It's insulting to have something happen and have to address the cause after the effect."

Another handicapped Brett resident, who would not give his name said, "In the winter we will become dependent on the snow shovelers and run the risk of sliding down the hill when going up to the front door."

John Findly, UMass assistant director for Housing Management said the project to replace dormitory doors is part of a campus-wide program to reduce security problems. No keys fit in the locks of the new side doors, and thus all students must enter the building through the front after 8 p.m. and pass security receptionists.

Curley said Housing Affairs has proposed an automatic door opener to fix the problem, though it would not be ready until next semester.

'Writers must seek the truth'

James Baldwin at UMass

By REBECCA THATCHER
Collegian Staff

"We must all question everything before it is too late," said novelist and playwright James Baldwin last night, to a standing-room only crowd in Mahar Auditorium.

In the sixth lecture of a seven-part series on Writers on Writers and Social Responsibility sponsored by the Institute for the Advanced Study of the Humanities, Baldwin said, "We have to take upon ourselves the responsibility to insure that there is another century. I refuse to believe that we can be manipulated into oblivion by the most literate people in the world."

Introduced by Julius Lester, associate director of the Institute, as "one of the best and most important writers of our time," Baldwin said it is the responsibility of writers to pursue the truth but simultaneously understand its elusiveness.

"There is an unspoken promise not to betray, to try to tell the truth, but every artist knows that it is impossible to tell the truth, it shimmers like a butterfly, . . . you can't tell the truth, but you have to trust it," he said.

Baldwin said terms like "minority writer" indicate something about the language in which we are trapped. He said a minority writer is a writer whose concerns are tangential to the mainstream.

"There is a mainstream and you better get into it. If you aren't in the mainstream, you are a minority—or a woman," he said.

The nature of being a writer, Baldwin said is to be a disturber of the peace.

"A writer has to make you realize that you are always asking yourself questions that you don't want to face."

As a young boy, Baldwin said he knew people in the street, in jail, those who ended up as junkies, and a 14 year-old girl who was pregnant and none of that impressed him as unimportant.

"It seemed to me that what was happening around me differed in no way from what Dickens was talking about centuries before I was born."

He said it was his country that insisted that what happened to him was different than what happened to Oliver Twist.

"It was my country that insisted that I was a minority writer and thus totally unconnected with the civilized world," he said.

Baldwin said, "I have been around a while and I wish I could tell you that the dynamic I have suggested has changed."

Army considered delaying invasion

NEW YORK (AP) — U.S. military intelligence before the Oct. 25 invasion of Grenada was so deficient that key Pentagon officials considered delaying the operation for another day, says the Army's chief of staff.

The idea was dismissed to avoid giving the already alerted enemy "another day of better defenses," Gen. John A. Wickham Jr. said Tuesday in an hour-long interview with The Associated Press. "The timing of the operation, the need to do it quickly, is what prevented us from developing a greater architecture of human intelligence," said Wickham. "We actually debated at the eleventh hour, the military folks, should we take another day to prepare the intelligence field better." But the Joint Chiefs of Staff and other military experts concluded that "another day of gathering intelligence and preparing ourselves with better planning would only give the enemy another day of better defenses."

US, USSR diplomatic since '33

WASHINGTON (AP) — A half century after being established, diplomatic relations between the United States and the Soviet Union are at one of their lowest ebbs, diplomatic veterans of both superpowers agree.

"We have got to find a way out of this mess we are in," Soviet Ambassador Anatoly Dobrynin said Tuesday night as he helped mark the anniversary of the opening of relations Nov. 16, 1933.

Four former U.S. ambassadors to the Soviet Union joined Dobrynin in marking 50 years of U.S. relations at a dinner sponsored by the Woodrow Wilson Center at the Smithsonian Institution.

Former Ambassador George Kennan was the gloomiest.

One of the nation's foremost diplomatic historians, Kennan said history teaches that a weapons race, such as the one in which Moscow and Washington now are engaged, is "a dangerous trap, form which, to date, the competing parties have never found a means of escape, except in the disasters of war." He said the two nations had been thrown into today's nuclear arms race and are "simply writhing helplessly, at immense danger to themselves and to the world around them."

Senate nixes tuition tax credits

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Senate turned its back on President Reagan's pleas for tuition tax credits for parents of private-school children Wednesday and rejected the legislation by a vote of 59-38.

Senators agreed to table a motion to add the legislation, which would allow parents of private school pupils a tax credit for up to half of a school's tuition, to a minor bill dealing with participants in the upcoming summer Olympic games.

Supporters of the legislation, however, indicated they would bring it up again after Congress returns from a year-ending recess due to start Friday.

Earlier, Reagan called the measure "simple tax equity" and promised to call senators seeking support for it. But opponents, led by Sen. Ernest L. Hollings, D-S.C., promised a filibuster, and in the last busy days before getting out of town, senators found that unpalatable. There is no prospect the House will consider the measure soon. Hollings said the legislation would "rip a revenue hemorrhage in the economic fabric" and called it "a ripoff for the rich" that would undermine public schools.

Feminist leader acquitted of murder

GRETNA, La. (AP) — A jury found California feminist leader Ginny Foat innocent Wednesday of murdering an Argentine businessman 18 years ago, rejecting as lies the testimony by her ex-husband who had implicated her.

"Thank you, thank you, everyone," Ms. Foat, 42, said to friends and supporters who cheered in the packed state District Court chamber as the jury returned its verdict after less than two hours of deliberations.

The six-man, six-woman jury had gotten the case after a plea from Ms. Foat's attorneys to look on John Sidote, her ex-husband and the prosecution's star witness, as "a crazy man and a liar."

Ms. Foat was charged with clubbing Argentine toymaker Moises Chayo to death with a tire iron in a New Orleans suburb in 1965 while robbing him of $1,400 cash.

Jurors said the verdict was unanimous for acquittal on the first vote.

After the verdict was read, Ms. Foat was mobbed by people from the audience offering congratulations. Even members of the jury approached her, some asking her to autograph placemats which they had picked up at lunch.

Civil Rights Commission to live

WASHINGTON (AP) — Congress passed and sent to the White House Wednesday a compromise bill to extend the life of the U.S. Civil Rights Commission for five years but change its makeup.

President Reagan already has pledged to sign the bill, a compromise between civil rights groups, liberal and conservative lawmakers, and the White House.

The House passed the measure by voice vote. It was approved by the Senate earlier.

Until the compromise was forged last week, the continued life of the commission was threatened by a dispute over Reagan's control of the agency.

Reagan claimed the right to dismiss commissioners who disagreed with him, and the dispute became especially bitter with his recent firing of three commission members who opposed his policies.

Burned youngster returns to Boston

BOSTON (AP) — Turning down the offer of a wheelchair, a 7-year-old boy burned over most of his body when his father set him on fire last summer returned to Boston for a check-up Wednesday.

"He's remarkable," Marie Rothenberg of New York City said as her son, David, walked stiffly but steadily through Logan International Airport. "He's doing great."

David, with a New York Jets cap topping the elastic mask that protects his face, was returning to Shriners Burns Institute for his first evaluation after being released from the hospital Sept. 23.

He shook his head when an airport attendent brought a wheelchair, then nodded when asked if he was feeling better. He walked with slight guidance from his mother until stepping outside the airport, when she carried him a short distance to the waiting taxi.

Sexist sculpture evicted from park

NEW HAVEN, Conn. (AP) — The creator of a bronze sculpture depicting three boys peering wide-eyed at a Playboy centerfold says it wasn't designed to influence children or insult women, but thinks a city park may not have been the best place for it.

The life-sized sculpture is to be removed from Wooster Square Park next week after complaints from nearby residents that it is sexist and is a bad influence on neighborhood youth. The sculpture, "Playmates," contains a small but explicit rendition of a page from Playboy. "You can see a woman who basically has her back to the audience and she is looking over her shoulders. She's partially clad. You can identify breasts and buttocks," explained Mara Brazer, executive director of Parkfriends, the group that brought the scuture to New Haven.

Cops can't find victim's relatives

GREENFIELD (AP) — Francis Doyle moved to Greenfield about six months ago and he served in the U.S. Navy.

But that's just about all police have been able to find out about the 57-year old man, who has been lying in a Springfield hospital bed, semi-conscious and unable to talk for the last month.

"We have just hit a blank wall trying to locate anyone who is related in any way — completely zero," Greenfield Police Detective Henry Burns said Wednesday.

Doyle suffered head injuries when he was hit by a car Oct. 14 while crossing Main Street in Greenfield, Burns said. He was listed in stable condition Wednesday in Baystate Medical Center in Springfield, according to hospital officials. "The doctor says he wakes up and follows you with his eyes, but he doesn't say anything," Burns said.

Public to get further access to Quabbin

By LARRY BOUCHIE
Collegian Correspondent

Nearby Quabbin Reservoir already offers a variety of watersport activities for daytime users and could offer further use, according to a University of Massachusetts Landscape Architecture professor.

Professor Larry Klar outlined some ideas for future recreation at the reservoir in an interview with Jeanne Hopkins Stover, host of the Commonwealth Journal, the UMass radio news magazine on WFCR. With the aid of civil engineering professor Peter Murphy, Klar has conducted research and several surveys concerning Quabbin usage.

Klar said Quabbin Reservoir is "primarily a sight-seeing and fishing reservoir. Picnicing, hiking, fishing from shore or from small-sized motor boats up to 20 horsepower, sightseeing, photography are all permitted and in the winter, in certain areas, snowshoeing."

A survey of almost 1000 Quabbin visitors conducted several years ago indicated respondents were in favor of many activities presently not permitted there. But Klar said participants were "not unexpectedly" against motorcycling, snowmobiling, large power boats, hunting, waterskiing and swimming.

"We have to keep in mind that a majority of the people in the survey drink Quabbin water," Klar said. "(But) Quabbin is so large that it would dilute any contamination from swimming to the point where it's essentially the same as background."

Klar proposed several sport packages with user fees to some of those surveyed.

"People would be willing to pay a $4 (entrance) fee to be able to hike, picnic, and fish for a day," he said, "and when we added canoeing and sailing it went up to $6." Those fees would easily underwrite any necessary reservoir expenses, he said.

As for increased recreational pollution, Klar said the only significant problem seemed to be fertilizer.

"If campers used (phosphorous) dishwashing detergents, if you used phosphorous fertilizer on green lawns,. . . or if your sanitary facilities weren't up to snuff so that you might need a sewage treatment plant" then there would be a build-up in the growth of algae, he said.

Klar said he recommended that great care be taken with the management of nutrient levels, particularly phosphorous. "Other things, like motorboating with the little bit of oil that gets in the water, just doesn't seem to matter," he said.

"I do believe, even given the weaknesses of hypothetical questions that with the right design, the right marketing and the advertising and image-building and service on the part of Metropolitan District Commission (MDC) officials, that there's no question in my mind that it could be a very popular place to go," Klar said.

Quabbin Reservoir is accessible by car by taking route 9 east through Belchertown Square and continuing for five miles to signs which give directions to different areas of the reservoir.

Rape victims given support

By ROBYN GOLDBERG
Collegian Correspondent

Women On Campus

Kathy Alexander would like to see a day when there would not be a need for her job. But until there are no rape victims on campus, she will continue to counsel them.

"I hope one day my job will not be necessary but I'm afraid that I'm going to be here for a while since there is a need for it," said Alexander, the Program Coordinator for Direct Services and Training Against Violence Against Women at the University of Massachusetts.

Alexander is responsible for 25 counselor advocates who provide around-the-clock service to victims of rape, battering, incest, and sexual harassment.

The counselors help victims deal with everyday problems that may arise and help them become aware of options available. They also escort women to court or the hopsital if necessary.

"I have always been interested in helping women," Alexander said.

Her past job experiences include teaching in New York for ten years, being principal of Cambridge Rindge and Latin High School for two years, working on the criminal justice force in New York and Cambridge, and counseling women in prison.

"I feel my past experience makes me well qualified to help women deal with their problems.

"It is important to educate people on the problem of rape. Women especially need to become aware of the problem," she said.

"There has been a definite increase in violence against women on campus," she said. "The only way to combat this problem is by using preventive measures and women should become aware of these."

Some of the preventive measures are traveling in groups, keeping dormitory rooms locked when sleeping, and always having an escort when walking around campus at night, she said.

"These protective measures still aren't a guarantee that a woman will not be raped," she said.

"Sixty-three percent of the rapes that occur are acquaintance rapes such as a relative or family friend," she said.

"When a rape occurs, the blame should never be on the woman; she is the victim. The blame should be on the attacker — the man," she said.

New law aids off campus students

A recent State Supreme Judicial Court ruling on landlord security deposit regulations is "definitely a great decision" for students living off campus at the University of Massachusetts, the director of the Off Campus Housing Office said Wednesday.

Director Joanne Levenson said that while it was already illegal for landlords to retain the balance of security deposits for more than 30 days after a tenant's lease had expired, tenants previously had to prove their landlord "acted in bad faith" in order to receive the triple damages available under the law in court.

Now, "it's a law in itself and tenants don't have to prove anything," Levenson said. "They broke the law, and you're entitled to triple the amount (of your security deposit balance)."

Levenson said the law is already in effect and would "have an effect for any case that's happened over the summer," noting new complaints would be forwarded to the office of the attorney general.

State may help feed needy kids

By MARY-SHEILA LOUGHLIN

Berkshire County families may benefit from a proposed state supplement to the federal Women, Infants, and Children (WIC) nutrition program, University of Massachusetts nutrition specialists said.

Gov. Michael S. Dukakis proposed a $6.6 million state supplement in response to a survey which found chronic malnutrition among poor children in Massachusetts a matter of concern.

Dukakis's proposal would make Massachusetts the first state in the nation to supplement the federal WIC program, which provides nutritious foods, counseling and health care referrals to low-income pregnant and nursing mothers, infants and pre-schoolers.

The survey, conducted by the State Department of Public Health on 1,429 Massachusetts children aged six months to six years, found that nearly 10 percent of these children suffer from chronic malnutrition.

Poor white and Southeast children in Massachusetts were found to be the most malnourished in the survey. Jeanne Shumway, communications coordinator for the Expanded Food and Nutrition at UMass, said many Southeast Asians are recent immigrants and must adjust to a change in diet. For example, she said, many are unable to digest milk, since it has never been a part of their normal diet.

Hillel Liebert, district health officer for the UMass Public Health department, said a 1981 report depicted Holyoke as having the highest infant mortality rate in the state. A 1982 report showed Holyoke still had a high mortality rate but not as high as in 1981, he said.

"The low birthrate and infant mortality rate (in Holyoke) are definitely associated with undernourishment among pregnant mothers and newborns," Lieber said.

Leslie Turner, nutrition specialist with the UMass nutrition program, said only 25 percent of Massachusetts women and children whose income qualifies them for participation in the WIC program are enrolled. Some $4.5 million of the proposed supplement would, over the next 19 months, serve those who are eligible for the nutrition program but who are not being reached because of low federal funding level.

"If the nutrition problem continues kids will not grow well and function well in school," Turner said.

Turner said it is often assumed that malnourished low-income people do not know how to shop correctly, but to many people in the area the real problem is in not having enough food.

The survey points out two basic needs, Shumway said, the first need is to feed the people and the second need is to educate families on such things as budget planning and getting the most food for their dollars, she said.

The nutritional survey states that "acute undernourishment is not a problem in Massachusetts." "Yet 10 percent of those little kids are in real trouble," Shumway said.

Protest staged near recruiters

By BRIAN SULLIVAN
Collegian Staff

A small group of University of Massachusetts students marched in formation to a spot beside the Marine and Navy recruiting table on the Campus Center Concourse Wednesday to protest United States involvement in Lebanon and Grenada.

At least eight of the students were dressed in military fatigues and six of them lay on the floor beside the table to represent recent U.S. casualties in Grenada and Lebanon while two more stood over them with wooden rifles.

Ron Milcarek, 27, graduate student and spokesman for the group said the protest was designed to show Umass students the reality of what has been going on in Grenada and Lebanon.

Milcarek said the group, which was comprised of students from the Western Massachusetts Latin American Solidarity Committee, the Radical Student Union as well as several concerned students, was not protesting the Marines who lost their lives in Grenada and Lebanon, but rather the policies of the U.S.

"The Marines killed in Lebanon and Grenada was a terrible loss of life," Milcarek said. "We have nothing against people who have joined the Marines. We are making our attack against the military organization which is not operating in the best interests of the United States."

Milcarek said the Marines should not be allowed to recruit on campus. He also said the protest was designed to help the average student make the connection between what is happening in the news and their own lives.

Marine 1st Lt. R.L. Auman, who was seated at the recruiting table, said he thought the students had every right to protest.

"That's what America is all about," Auman said.

L. Scott Cohen, 21, a political science major passing by, said he thought the protest was "foolish as hell." Cohen said he supported the invasion of Grenada and felt the protest might actually boost interest in the Marines.

The protesters stayed beside the table for about 25 minutes, holding signs that carried the slogans of their cause and whistling the Marine Hymn America the Beautiful to the crowd. They then got back into formation and marched away.

Brian Clark, 19, an undeclared major, said the protest was a surprise, but he added "it's something you can expect at UMass."

Food drive helps families give thanks

By TRICIA A. YACOVONE
Collegian Staff

People who are unable to celebrate the traditional American feast at this time of year because of a lack of food will have a full table this Thanksgiving with the help of a food drive sponsored by the Newman Student Association.

The Thanksgiving food drive, under the leadership of Darlene Martin, who ran the drive last year as well, began collecting non-perishable food items last Sunday, and will continue doing so until this Sunday.

The donations will be divided and wrapped up into baskets of varying sizes. The food will then be distributed to families in the area who have been recommended by the Amherst Survival Center and other services and church groups, said Brian McGrath, president of the association.

While food has already started coming in, he said, the bag drive will be this Sunday because people will have time to shop on the weekend, he said.

But shoppers do not necessarily have to donate food this way, if they shop at Louis Foods on North Pleasant Street, McGrath said. Customers buying at least $30 worth of groceries can tell the cashier that they want their receipts validated. These receipts can be brought to the Newman Center, and Louis Foods will donate five percent of the price to the drive for perishable items, Martin said.

McGrath said he was optimistic that the drive will be more successful than last year's which resulted in the collection of more than 50 food baskets for the area's needy.

He said the most important aspect of the drive is helping people.

"Basically, (it's a way) that people can get involved and help out a lot of people. Everyone can pitch in one can of non-perishable food," he said.

DVP to present Seymour Hersh this evening

Pulitzer Prize-winning journalist Seymour Hersh will speak about his new book, The Price of Power, on Thursday, November 17, at the University of Massachusetts.

Hersh won the Pulitzer Prize for International Reporting in 1970 for his coverage of the My Lai massacre in Vietnam. His work has appeared in Atlantic Monthly Magazine, the New York Times, and the New York Times Magazine. He has also published a number of books.

Hersh's lecture is being sponsored by the Distinguished Visitors Program. It will be held in Herter 231, and is free and open to the public.

"It will work something like a garage door opener. The student will have a device to open the door and then after entering can close the door after them by pushing the device," he said. "I think it's a good idea, and it will make the doors more accessible than any others."

Paul Appleby, director of the Handicapped Student Affairs Office said he was not informed the doors were going to be replaced until after the fact.

"I think it was an oversight and I'm confident that something satisfactory will be done," he said.

Curley who said he also was not notified of the replacement, said he believed the new doors would reduce security problems in the dorm, noting instances of female students being harassed in Brett stairwells and bathrooms.

China Gate falls short

CHINA GATE
By William Arnold
Villiard Books, 429 pages, $15.95

By CHRISTINE MARINI
Collegian Staff

China Gate was an ambitious project for a first novel. Author William Arnold spans three decades and as many continents, trying to distill the modern American experience in Asia into the life of one mythic figure. Perhaps one should not be surprised, then, that Arnold fell short of his goal with China Gate; in many ways it reads as a book that was written by an author unready to grapple with such a massive topic.

China Gate is ostensibly the story of William Jennings Bryan Whyte, an American born and bred in China, and the dynasty he founds on Taiwan after the separation from mainland China. Whyte begins his career in the early 1960's as the leader of a teenaged street gang, the Omega Chi, that is involved in the thriving blackmarket underworld of Chinese and Taiwanese mobs. China Gate follows Whyte and his cohorts through the turbulent years of the Vietnamese war, as friendships and fortunes, all on an epic scale, rise and fall in concert with international events. Arnold juxtaposes these personal and public landscapes with the grace and skill of a novice juggler.

Arnold seems unable to detach himself from his narrative at any point. He spent his own youth on Taiwan in the early 60's, and seems not to have put much distance between himself and his past. The many clumsy correlaries between Arnold's nostalgic reminiscences and the plot of China Gate are blatant and rather embarrassing. Unresolved semi-autobiography in the guise of fiction won't fool anyone for long, especially not when written in flat, rambling, uninspired prose.

The novel is uneven; time moves in jumps and spurts. Arnold's incessant editorializing of world events if irritating, and his presumptuous characterizations unsatisfying. The women in China Gate in particular are two-dimensional characters idealized to a level of complete unreality. They, and the male characters as well, lack clear motivations for their actions and are in effect pawns over-manipulated by Arnold. One is always aware, while reading China Gate, of the author's presence. He weighs down the narrative and ultimately crushes the potential of his novel.

Boy, if ever there was a weekend that was not happening last weekend was it. Why are we in such an all or nothing valley? I know I've harped on this one in the past, but it amazes me how consistantly we get large quantities of good music or none at all. Once again we've got a good weekend to look forward to, but honestly, you can't survive most weekends going to the movies every night. Sure, Dead Zone is awesome, I'd be the last one in the world to doubt Andy Gordon, but how many times can you see it before you go beserk? TUNEAGE. I look forward to something every weekend, too bad it doesn't happen. Maybe the administration should move this school to Boston. . .

So tonight what do we have thats so great? For one the Fine Arts Center features the offbeat wall-of-sound that has become affectionately known as the B-52s. Its been a few years since Rock Lobster, but age has dealt this band a level of maturity which should please all. After the concert you can head to the Bluewall for Boston Punk night featuring the loudest and brashest from the Bean Pot, or, if your head needs some cooling down, Leo Kottke, the contemporary king of folk guitar will be making one of his all too rare appearances at the Iron Horse Cafe. Or if ya still gotta dance bip over to Sheehan's Cafe to bop with the Bounce, a new local band with some impressive sounds.

Friday night features the return of the New Models to the Hangar One. Once the toast of all Boston, this group has yet to overcome a severe case of Car-itis, a disease groups that come in contact with Ric Ocasek often contract. Opening are Rapture of the Dope. The November Group and Kasper Hauser will be at the Bluewall, and NRBQ will sling the blues down memory lane at the Rusty Nail.

Saturday night the Fine Arts Center is once again the place to be, with singer of reknown Chaka Kahn and Pieces of a Dream (Pizzas and Ice Cream?). For the less daring there is Berlin Airlift, a watered down version of Luna, which was a watered down version of Orchestra Luna, which was a watered down version of flitter rock-David Bowie, at the Hangar; they put on a good show. Reggae is still alive and well with Loose Caboose at the Wok; they're also there Friday night.

Upcoming concerts include Translator out of L.A. on Monday at the Hangar and the Rick James show featuring the Mary Jane Girls, the Stone City Band, and the S.O.S. in Hartford on Nov. 25.

Chaka Khan: if her vinyl's any hint, Saturday's show should be dynamite.

"Record breaking" new vinyl

By GERARD COSLOY
Collegian Staff

A better week than last, new rec's from the heroic Husker Du and always-changing Minutemen insuring that I won't be able to hear by the time this reaches print. Cool gig coming up that you should be aware of:

On Saturday the 19th, Flipper, San Francisco's noise equivalent to the Grateful Dead will be playing for all-ages at the Guiding Star Grange in Greenfield, MA. Also appearing will be Christmas (from Boston), the Pajama Slave Dancers and Sorry. Admission is $5 at the door, and the show starts at 6 p.m. (sorry, but no alcohol is allowed). For more info, call 546-6546.

Now back to the usual stuff:

AZTEC CAMERA — "Oblivious"/"We Could Send Letters"/"Back On Board" (WEA Import double 45) — Best songs from the fab High Land, Hard Rain LP, as performed live in Toronto; strong, sloppy versions. I'm still a fan, but I'm wondering how much longer Roddy Frame is gonna live off songs he wrote 2½ years ago — time for some new material?

CIRCLE JERKS — Golden Shower Of Hits (Lax LP) — An improvement over last year's disappointing Wild In The Streets, new songs like "When The Shit Hits The Fan" and "High Price On Our Heads" harkening back to the days of Group Sex. The Jerks also continue their track record of selecting fine hits to cover, "Jerks On 45" finding such worthy targets as the Starland Vocal Band's "Afternoon Delight," or Paul Anka's "Having My Baby," a hit which raised the ire of feminists everywhere.

ECHO & THE BUNNYMEN — The Echo (Sire 12" EP) — Echo greatest hits repackaged for the US market, a live take of "Do It Clean" included to get fans' $$. Wait for the new 45 instead.

THE FALL — "Kicker Conspiracy" (Rough Trade Import 45) — No real progress here, "Kicker" reminding of the worst elements of the dull Room To Live EP. The flip, "Wings" is being referred to by Mark E. Smith as, "the best thing I've ever done." Aaahh, not quite, but pretty hypnotic just the same.

DISCHARGE — Warning: Her Majesty's Government Can Seriously Damage Your Health (Clay 12" Import) — It's not Discharge's new heavy metal sound that I mind, it's their current lack of energy or imagination. Cal's trademark shriek is now reduced to a muttering monologue, new guitarist Pooch pales next to Angus Young when you're forced to think about it.

BOB DYLAN — Infiedels (Columbia LP) — Worthless and predictable. Sly & Robbie appear to have been hired on name alone, Bob's "insight" being more clouded than usual. Dylan a "poet?" As he's said before, only Smokey Robinson gets that tag.

KURTIS BLOW — Party Time? (Mercury 12") — It's been a while since Mr. Blow came up with anything nearly as hot as "The Breaks", and Party Time? is no exception. The title track is essentially as poor re-do of "The Message," nuevo-catch phrases like "bill collector" and "World War III" get thrown into the call & response fray with little sensitivity shown.

THE MINUTEMEN — Buzz Or Howl Under The Influence Of Heat (SST 12") — Where their last LP, the magnificent What Makes A Man Start Fires? hinted at a slant towards jazz in the M-men's jazz/punk forays, Buzz Or Howl goes full tilt. There's more built-up tension in "Cut" than anything they've ever recorded; taut, pointed interplay between the Watt/Hurley rhythm section and the newfound psychoselectric guitar riffs of D. Boon. One of America's finest units continues to evolve.

SISTERS OF MERCY — "Temple Of Love" (Brain Eater 12" EP) — Although their live set is one of the more laughable I've ever seen, the Sisters have yet to make a bad 45; "Body Electric," "Alice," "Anaconda" all being the best Bauhuas/Killing Joke updates currently playing. "Temple Of Love" goes farther in terms of establishing an original identity; production is LOUDER, drum machine pumps harder, etc. Their best yet, although the limp, doomy version of "Gimmmie Shelter" that's on the flip should be ignored in favor of (gasp) the new Stones 45.

THE CRAMPS — Smell of Female (Enigma 12") — The Cramps Halloween show in Boston was their most restrained live appearance to date, singer Lux Interior somehow managing to keep his pants on for the duration (40 minutes?!) of the set. The new Cramps' live record is much the same; you anticipate wild abandon on the way in, you exit having heard a clean, yet effective rave-up. How the band that made such grundgy studio records now sounds so slick on a live EP is a mystery to me. Still, the Cramps' cover of "Psychotic Reaction" is worth the price of admission.

PICK OF THE WEEK:

HUSKER DU: "Metal Circus" (SST 12") — "People talk about anarchy/and taking up a fight/well I'm afraid of things like that/I lock my doors at night/I don't rape & I don't pillage/other people's lives/I don't practice what you preach/and I won't see through your eyes," Bob Mould says it better than I ever could; along with REM, Husker Du are making the most vital American rock of any band in these post-Burma days...raw, passionate, not enough control to stay calm, enough control to stay rational.

● Wynton Marsalis is the most celebrated new trumpeter in years. "Think Of One" follows a debut album which has already won everything from down beat's Jazz Album Of The Year and Musician Of The Year to Record Of The Year from Stereo Review and Jazz Times.
● Paquito D'Rivera credits his unmistakable sax style on "Live At Keystone Korner" to "classical training, Cuban roots and jazz tradition." Whether he's swinging with infectious energy or being intimately gentle, the sound is always pure Paquito.
● James Blood Ulmer has been called the most original guitarist since Jimi Hendrix. His new album, "Odyssey," is an epic adventure—the kind of boundary-breaking, category-confusing songs that can only be called great music.
● "Vital Information" is the electric jazz debut of drummer and composer, Steve Smith. His band's collective credits include playing time with Miles Davis, Billy Cobham, Al Di Meola and Jean-Luc Ponty. In short, this is music too essential to miss.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

Blind patriots won't save us

In what is perceived as one of the most progressive communities in the nation, it is amazing how many University of Massachusetts students are conservative as suggested by the success of the newly-formed UMass Republican Club.

And while a person's political preference is not a sole basis for a lasting impression, the motivation behind choosing one's party persuasion arouses my curiosity.

The logical steps would be to learn current issues, the liberal, conservative and other points of views, and make a decision.

Tami Borton

But Ronald Reagan's popularity, much of which was gained through a barbaric act and effective deluding of the public about its significance, concludes this matter is not being addressed logically.

The attack on Grenada (a suggested vacation destination in a recent Glamour magazine) should be equated to a college kid picking on a first grader, especially with the lack of clear cut evidence that we beat Cuba to the punch.

When the administration changes its point of view "invasion," "rescue mission," "gravepit," "no gravepit" — what they do tell us worries me. After all, the press is not getting complete access to evidence. They call this freedom of the press?

Are we not the same as the bestial "thugs" who attacked us in Beirut? Peace through military strength is playing a game of Stratego with our lives that becomes increasingly dangerous as more and more nuclear weapons are deployed.

The newfound blind patriotism among our conservative peers will not save us, for our opponents are also willing to die for their cause, without any hope of returning home (for example, the recent kamikazee attack on our Marines.)

It is too soon to judge the stability of the controversial "Reaganomics," much of the high inflation and unemployment is due to a lag from the Carter days.

But if implementing policies of tax and budget cuts, many thoughtless decisions were made on the letter.

When public schools are the only place many poor children eat a nutritious meal, reducing allocations to federal lunch programs is inexcusable. In fact, any hunger in a country where the government pays its farmers to store their surplus is appalling.

The tightening of funds for education not only prohibits many a brilliant mind from the right to use it, but jeopardizes the potential for the future of our country.

This, indirect assault on humanity is only compounded when military expenditures are constantly increasing.

This all leads me to believe that other inputs influence a conservative's ideology.

Perhaps it is the very image of a well dressed, successful businessman versus the jean-clad liberal who worships the Dead or the Clash that may be enough in itself to make one want to be a conservative.

Perhaps Reagan holds a hero status in the hearts of these conservatives.

By this token, John Wayne could be a strong candidate for the Republican presidential ticket, if he were alive.

I have yet to see a good reason for a conservative viewpoint when it represents our present leaders. But too many continue to support this administration under the false belief that everything is okay.

Reagan exports the Red Scare

During his visit to Tokyo last week, President Reagan lavished praise on the Japanese, who, he said, "are of one heart (with Americans) in their devotion to the principles of our free societies." He called upon them to join the U.S. in a "powerful partnership for good."

He also took the occasion to say: "a nuclear war can never be won and must never be fought...our dream is to see the day when nuclear weapons will be banished from the face of this earth."

Ian Polumbaum

This oration surely strikes an emotional chord in the country of Hiroshima and Nagasaki, but it reeks of hypocrisy. The Reagan Administration's real nuclear policy aims to be able to "prevail" in a nuclear exchange, asking Congress to fund more first-strike weapons which will make the atomic hair-trigger even more sensitive. (Let us not forget a TV address several months ago in which the President's eyes gleamed as he announced his desire to extend the arms race into space.)

By "partnership for good" Reagan means, of course, alliance against the Soviet Union, which he has called "the great evil empire." He lauds Japan's peace-loving character, undoubtedly knowing that that nation's constitution says "the Japanese people forever renounce war" and pledges Japan not to revive its pre-WWII military power.

At the same time, his Administration and members of the House Armed Services Committee (i.e. Rep. Levin of New York) clamor for Japan to increase its military spending, saying that all the weight of its defense is being shouldered by the United States. Last Thursday's "20/20" audience saw ABC's Sylvia Chase's bleached hair flapping in the breeze on a carrier deck as she proclaimed our Navy the "protector of the Pacific."

Protector of the Pacific from what? Japan might ask. The Japanese evidently do not fear, however Mr. Reagan would like them to, that they are about to be invaded by the Soviets. With their phenomenal industrial prosperity and strong nationalism, they could easily start a major military buildup if they saw fit.

But, while they are as distressed as anyone else by the invasion of Afghanistan, the repression in Poland and the downing of KAL flight 007, the Japanese do not see confrontation and displays of force as ways to ease world tensions.

They are not apt to be convinced otherwise by the polemic pitting "civilized values" against terrorist thugs" which has become a Presidential trademark; nor by flowery admiration of their peacable nature which veils the dubious premise that to preserve their tranquility, they must become more militaristic.

Reagan's address to Japan's Parliament was cleverly crafted. He skirted economic issues causing friction between Washington and Tokyo, so that he could "use praise of Japan to denigrate the Soviet Union" (NY Times, 11/11) and drum up support for his own foreign policy. His underlying motive was not to further diplomacy, but to export the Red Scare.

Blue Wall policy is useless

To the Editor,

I have come to realize that the new policy for under-age Blue Wall-goers is ludicrous. The new policy has made it possible for 18 and 19 year-old students to attend "special events" at the Blue Wall but, it remains to exclude those same students from entertainment which is not classified as "special," such as the mid-week free movies. Who defines what a "special event" is? Why is this new and 'improved' policy so needlessly restricting? Why are the 'under-age' Campus Center fee-payers excluded from simple entertainment? Poor policy is useless policy!

Minor intrapersonal problems?

To the Editor,

Much controversy has been generated lately about the "pigeons" in the Campus Center, that is, Building Operations employees who sit on the radiator by the barbershop during their breaks and watch the women walk by. In a Collegian editorial "Pigeons Don't Cause Real Problems" (Mon. Nov. 14, 1983), Walter Branson states: "the misappropriation of that label to a petty quarrel such as this can only serve to make us question the reality of serious incidences of harassment." Cases of "serious" sexual harassment often begin with what some people would refer to as 'innocent' comments or 'appreciative' stares, only later to progress to more overtly physical manifestations.

This situation is more than a "minor interpersonal problem." Mr. Branson states that "one of the workers...made remarks to some of the women, but only because he knew them personally." Does knowing the women "personally" give this worker the right to verbally harass her? One should not expect this to be handled on an "interpersonal level" by the SAO women; the disciplinary action should be taken by the workers' supervisor.

I do not work in the Student Activities Office, but this past summer I also had to walk by the place and persons in question to pick up our office's mail in the Campus Center. Several times I would walk around to the outside of the building rather than subject myself to the stares of a few of the men (not all of them engage in this practice). This behavior is more than "mildly annoying." It provokes in myself, and in others, frustration and anger at the fact that because we are women we must, in order to avoid being gawked at, drastically alter our perambulatory habits.

I do not believe in infringing upon a person's right to mobility during his/her break time; however, when his/her behavior interferes with someone else's right to walk in an area comfortably, without being an object of lascivious gazes and verbal harassment, then I think a designated break area or areas (such as the Hatch or the Coffee Shop) should be suggested and adhered to as places of congregation.

Is Rand our future?

To the Editor,

I would like to bring to your attention the article in you paper on November 15, 1983. When I initially saw th Rand mural, I was offended because it was not represen tative of the kind of theater that I would like to see offere by this university. It portrays an elitist image of whit aristocratic society that does not relate to real life. Per sonally I was deeply disturbed when I first viewed th mural some two weeks ago. As a member of the Third World Community I felt the image was tantamount t posting a "Whites Only" sign on the building, effectively creating an artistically rendered message of Jim Crow – ism 1980's style.

In the article the artist is quoted as saying, "We hope t connect the image of the painting with the Rand itself." I am dismayed by this rather blatant and insensitive statement.

Why must we continue to revert to the restrictions and stereotypes of white superiority and sexism that students have fought against for so long? Artists are the visionaries of society. Is this our vision of the future?

Men already have rights

To the Editor,

Thank you for covering the Northeast Regional Men's Conference that was held at Hampshire College recently. I enjoyed talking with your reporter and sharing about the men's movement with him.

However, I am angry about the headline that was used for the article: "Hampshire College conference says men have rights, too." This kind of distortion and misrepresentation of information for sensational appeal reflects the worst in journalism.

The focus of the conference was not on men's rights, and certainly not "men's rights, too" (implying a comparison, even competition, with women's rights). The conference was about challenging traditional male gender roles that limit men and oppress women. The conference was about confronting sexism in ourselves and our society; about overcoming homophobia and ending the oppression of gay men and lesbians.

We in the men's movement are very explicit about these directions. I carefully explained them to your reporter.

And yet, you still have the presumption to put words in our mouths, and to present a completely incorrect statement to the public.

Please be more careful about your reporting.

TV can be educational

One afternoon this past weekend, for lack of anything better to do, I turned on the television. Consequently, I was assaulted by commercials (what can you expect from network television?) and insulted by the products women are used — almost exclusively — to sell.

I learned that afternoon that I, as a woman, am supposed to have clean, beautiful, bouncy, and well-conditioned hair. If I don't, I should hide in a doorway if any male acquaintance walks by because my "greasies" would revolt him and I would lose all hope of ever being able to speak to him again. I should also have a figure as lithe and slim as the woman/straw who slips sensually into the water in the Diet Pepsi commercials. I now know that to be sexually appealing my whole body has to be perfect — my arms, my thighs, my waist and especially my chest. Think for a moment about that commercial. Have you ever noticed that the only man on it is shown only from his waist to his upper thighs? His crotch is the main focal point. This implication is that our sole judge of a man should be his "natural endowments." Even so, the criteria set for women are tougher — a woman has to have complete beauty: face and torso, to be beautiful/sexy (both words mean the same thing in the context of this Diet Pepsi commercial).

I was also informed via the commercials that afternoon that I should read the labels on every item of food I purchase for my house. To be a "true" woman I must insure that my children get their full days supply of vitamins and that they do not gorge themselves on evil foods filled with chemical preservatives. This is my natural duty, of no concern to my husband (for I must also insure that he eats the correct foods).

Imagine, if you can, a healthy middle-aged man standing in a spotless kitchen, lovingly holding a jar of Tang and being comforted by the fact that his children will get their "full days supply of vitamin C." It's a pretty ludicrous image isn't it?

I was also informed that women are the "authorities" when it comes to doing laundry (what an educational afternoon it was!). The only men ever shown in commercials relating to laundry are young bachelors. It's always a woman, whether it's a girlfriend who comes for dinner (and is so disgusted by his "ring around the collar" that she forgos a delicious meal in order to teach him how to properly wash his clothes) or a mother who pays a surprise visit, that teaches these young, helpless men the fundamentals of doing laundry. It's a woman who develops a guilt complex when she realizes that her family's clothes are scratchy and uncomfortable because she didn't use Downy fabric softener. Finally, it's always a woman who is shown being educated (by another woman none-the-less) as to the new and improved laundry detergents such as ERA (does that title, the same as the acronym for the equal rights movement, imply that "liberated women" should use this product?) or Solo. Can you picture a man driving up in a pick-up truck, thrusting two measuring cups out the window and yelling "Hey Sam, you got any laundry detergent and fabric softener? I'm out with two loads to go!"

I realize that these commercials are designed to sell their products. Therefore they try to appeal to the people most likely to purchase these products — women. It's no excuse for perpetuating these stereotypical images: woman as mother (only), woman as happy homemaker, woman as sex symbol. As long as these commercials are dominated by women, the chores and images depicted will be considered exclusively "feminine." Not only do these commercials reinforce traditional notions of women, they also educate and condition the young, male and female alike, to these generalizations.

Thus I became disgusted that afternoon. I was constantly conditioned as to what my work as a woman should be. If I tried to forgo these chores and (god forbid) give them to a man I would be shirking my "natural duties." It seems funny that when I am in college, trying to educate myself so I will not be doomed to being "barefoot and pregnant," I still have this feeling...no matter what work I secure after I graduate it will still be assumed that household chores are my "natural" work.

Do you know what I really hate?

You know what I really hate? It's people who say they're radical, or progressive, and committed to "change," yet insist on killing themselves, and me with them.

What heineous bunch of people are we dealing with here? Yes, cigarette smokers. Especially those who ask me if "I'd mind," and when I say "sort of," wind up torching one up anyway.

Do they think cigarettes are sexy, macho, or alluring?

Josh Meyer

Evidently so, no doubt due to the good grace and massive ad campaigns of the major cigarette companies.

They probably already know that the tobacco lobby is the second most powerful force affecting federal and state legislation in the country, able to kill any and all anti-smoking laws and ad campaigns with one swipe of its massive hand. And I'm sure that they know they're being manipulated by the tobacco companies into consuming as many "cancer sticks" as they can, and into giving themselves lung, mouth, esophageal and bladder cancer, not to mention heart and circulatory disease, just so these corporations can "increase their profit margin."

My friends all love it when I tell them that to be honest, kissing a chain-smoker is like licking an ashtray. Maybe they think smoking is something to be envied or at least noticed. I know I've always been incredibly fascinated at the way people hang burning sticks of garbage out of the sides of their mouths as they squint to stop going blind by smoke in their eyes. And I know that they listen attentively when I tell them that each cigarette they smoke has over 2000 chemicals, two hundred additives, dozens of known carcinogenic hydrocarbons in the tars (not counting the carcinogenic effects of the smoke itself).

And I know that they listen to me when I tell them that the smoke out of the side of the cigarette is much worse than that drawn through the filter. And that smoking (and breathing in other peoples' smoke) does more than cause lung cancer, one of modern society's killers. Most people are very considerate and understanding about how I feel as a non-cigarette smoker having to be constantly subjected to inhaling disgustingly stale grey smoke which makes my eyes tear, and my nose itch, and my clothes smell, and my head hurt. In fact, they care so much that a little later they'll light another one up. You see, nicotine (the prime ingredient in cigarettes that companies cram in to keep people buying the 500 billion butts smoked every year) is an addictive drug. According to junkies, it is easier to kick heroin than nicotine, a legal, fully advertised and acceptable over-the-counter product.

So they can sympathize with me when I ask them to even blow the smoke in the other direction. Sometimes my friends feel bad when I ask them to stop. They'd like to stop, but they can't.

Today is National Smoke-Out Day, where all you poor, crazed and drugged-out tobacco fiends will attempt to do the humanly impossible task of kicking the habit for ONE DAY. Even if the intense desire to succeed is there, the end result may well be a failure, due to the physical and chemical addiction.

But please try to stop. If not for your sake, then for mine!

Solomon appears to be unfair

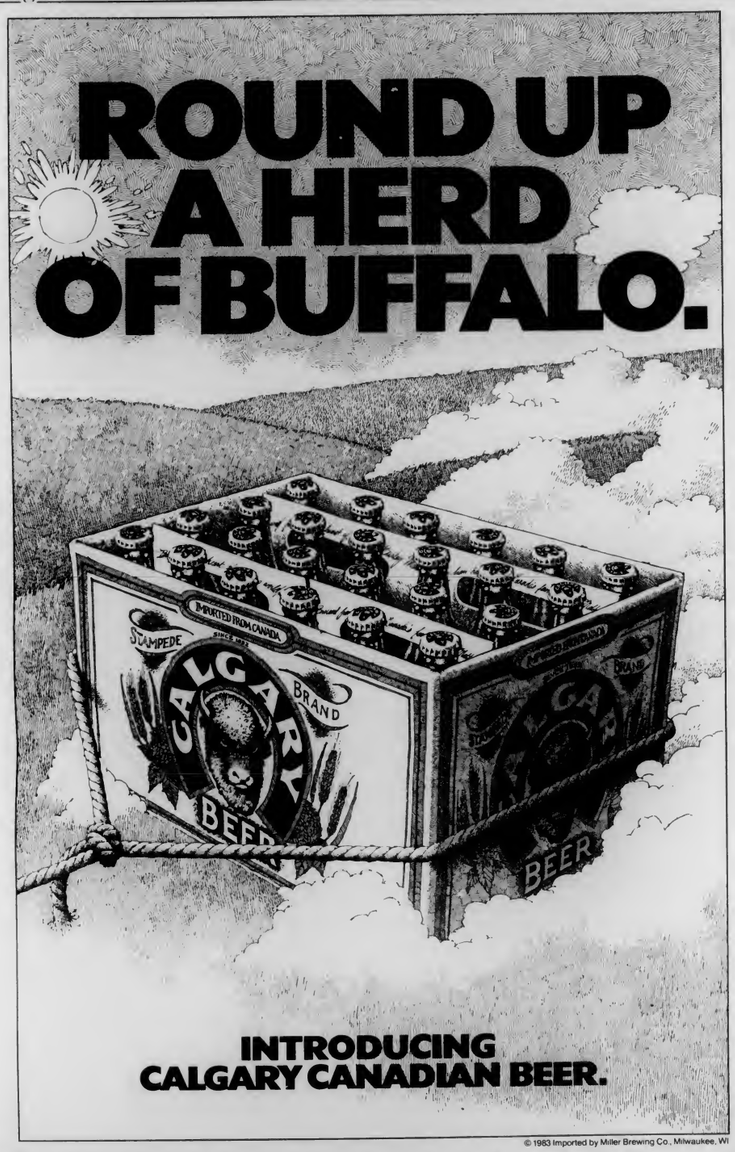
The Solomon Amendment is so discriminatory and unconstitutional that it causes me to wonder what exactly America stands for.

For those of you unfamiliar with the Solomon Amendment, it is a law that requires people applying for federal financial aid to prove that they have registered with the Selective Service, or prove why they are exempt from the law, i.e. women, people born before 1960 and such.

The law is temporarily in effect until the U.S. Supreme Court determines its constitutionality, probably sometime in the spring of 1984.

Dani Burgess

Although personally I feel that Selective Service and the draft are certainly vulnerable to criticism, I do not want to focus on that issue here. Instead I would like to focus on the problems found within the Solomon Amendment. In other words, it is not the law that I am questioning here, but the means of enforcement.



There are a number of different ways that the Solomon Amendment is prejudicial. The primary discriminatory factor is that it only applies to people applying for financial aid, i.e. people of the lower economic class. The second way the Solomon Amendment is unfair is that it only applies to men. If you are a woman then you are exempt from the law. The last way that the Solomon Amendment is unfair is that it only applies to men born after 1960.

In terms of constitutionality, one of the basic rights of people in this country is the right to have one's innocence assumed until proven guilty. The Solomon Amendment assumes guilt until a person proves him or herself innocent.

An analogy to the issue of enforcement could be compared to police issuing speeding tickets. We have a law that states that no one shall go faster than the posted speed limits, and we want to enforce that law. Suppose that it was easiest to check the speed of blue cars rather than red cars and police decide only to check the speed of blue cars in order to at least start to enforce the law and decide that they will get the red cars sometime...Is this fair to the people in the blue cars? Of course not. Compare this to the issue of the Solomon Amendment, we have a law that we want to enforce, and right now we are only enforcing people who apply for financial aid supposedly since it is an easy area to enforce. To me this seems very unfair and discriminatory. Why should rich people get by without being checked? I would say that an equitable way to enforce Selective Service would be by way of driver's license's. This would apply to a much larger amount of the population, it wouldn't discriminate on either the basis of class or race, and it would give no one an unfair advantage. To choose people applying for financial aid as a main group to enforce Selective Service simply perpetuates a problem this country has had since its foundation, that a gross inproportionate amount of poor men find themselves the first to be drafted and the first to die on the front lines. This is a United States historical fact!

The week after the Korean Airline incident, the House of Representatives in Massachusetts passed a state version of the Solomon Amendment. They didn't even wait to see what the Supreme Court had to say. Early last week, right after the Lebanon Crisis, the Mass Senate passed the law as well. When I think of how timely both of the State Bills passed I feel like a pawn in someone else's chess game. When there is a national incident people seem to 'forget' that the issue is still unresolved in the Supreme Court. It is for these and other reasons that I feel that "Solomon sucks."

The debate is painfully irrelevant

To the Editor,

What is the proper function of a student government? Presently, the SGA is deeply divided over the issue of the Grenada resolution. What is unfortunate is that the division is not centered on a judgement of the invasion itself, but whether it is proper for the student government to say anything, either pro or con, about Grenada or in general about issues of national and international scope. Much of the debate is painfully irrelevant. One side presents the locality of the SGA's concerns as if it were an axiom, the other side responds by citing the importance of national and international issues in our immediate lives as students and as citizens, and generally by reciting the standard litany of politically correct consciousness.

My first comments are to the 'localists'. It is not etched in stone that the SGA must be a parochial body. Do whatever you want, address whatever you please, — alienate your constituents! Your political power is at best a little vanity; you can survive among us plebians. Could you imagine evincing some interest from the student body? Enough to get you turned out of office for some action that you took as a representative?

For the defenders of the faith and their melody of the 'pressing concerns of the day' I have even less patience. The Grenada resolution was at best an opportunity to heap invectives upon your stodgy colleagues. When it failed, it died, and it rapidly began to putrify. Bury it — the symbolism is being made into a fetish. But spare us the defense of your position! Why appeal to the student body now, in this context? The conservative dinks have already been elected. Drop the posture of political education, plot to seize power, conspire to throw the ROTcies off campus, — alienate the mass of the students! Dare to be interesting.

Collegian NFL Picks

It's week 12 of the National Football League and the competition is heating up for playoff berths and the Collegian writers are jockeying for position.

Last week, Billy Shea was tops as he went 10-4 to move into first place, overall.

Tony Betros and Kevin Deuca stayed tied by going 9-5 and Deluca picked the San Diego upset over Dallas and the Houston upset over Detroit. Scott Hood and Gerry deSimas went a respectable 8-6. The hurting Jets and New Orleans play on Monday night.

experience frontcourt for UMass allows Gerlufsen the luxury of grooming his sophomore center for the future. Including Emerson, Gerlufsen has six forwards battling for minutes.

The first and probably the best, Edwin Green will open his fourth season as a forward playing center. The 6'6" Green has jumped center 82 times for UMass since he hit the Amherst campus and facing taller men is nothing new for Edwin.

Green uses his size and quickness to his advantage. He has perfected his 15 foot turnaround jumper in the lane, leading the conference in field goal shooting last year, and his leaping ability and long arms helped him swat away 58 shots last year.

Horace Neysmith will be back at his power forward spot. Last year's leading rebounder, Neysmith averaged exactly 11.7 points both his freshman and sophomore year. Consistent in most areas of his game Neysmith needs to improve on his ballhandling (he led the team in turnovers last year) and his foul shooting (53 percent carrier).

At the other forward spot is sophomore John Hempel. The 6'7" 225 lb sophomore led the team in scoring last year (16.2 ppg); three point land (24 for 42, 57 percent) but record. Hempel led the Atlantic Ten from three point land (24 for 42), 57 percent) but this year, with the abolition of the three point shot, Hempel may spend less time tossing three pointers from the left corner and spend more time moving with out the ball on offense.

First off the bench will probably be junior Bobby Braun. The junior from Neptune, New Jersey came to UMass two years ago from Drexel looking like a miniature Billy Paultz but this year he's 20 pounds lighter and Gerlufsen will be looking for the usual consistent performance underneath from Braun.

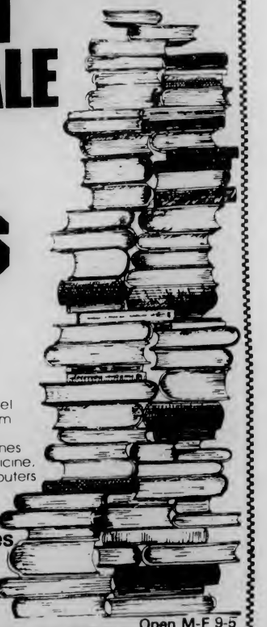
According to Gerlufsen, junior Skip Connors has been impressive in preseason workouts and should see some action. The 6'8" Connors transferred from Manhattan College and contributed at both guard and forward last year.

Finally, junior George Ramming may help off the bench. The 6'6" Ramming started as a freshman but saw very little action last year with the arrival of Hempel.

Equestrian in top three

Sixteen University of Massachusetts Equestrian riders brought home 20 awards in the team's final meet of the season, November 12th at Becker Junior College. Eleven UMass riders finished in the top three of their classes.

"The team showed talent, depth, and character," said UMass Coach Ken Whelihan. The talent department was headed up by freshman Jody Osinoff, who won the reserve high point rider award and two first place ribbons.



Melissa Bilodeau exemplified the team's determination by taking third in her jumping class riding with a broken leg. The team will practice throughout the winter and resume its show schedule in early March.

"There really hasn't been anything like this in contemporary mystery fiction," says Publishers Weekly. William Morrow and Company is offering $10,000 in cash to the reader who most correctly answers the questions: Who killed the Robins family? And Where and When and How and Why did they die?

The book itself is a taut murder mystery in the classic tradition —except you are the detective! There are eight wealthy, ill-fated Robins you must account for. Red herrings abound. So do real clues. First clue: you'll find contest rules in the front of the book. Second clue: advance readers agree that "this is a puzzle that intrigues, delights, and makes every mystery fan an instant Sherlock Holmes."—Mary Higgins Clark, author of A Stranger Is Watching you pass with flying colors.

A deftly hurled splotch of magenta blended surrealistically, with a cascade of vermilion, occasional suggestions of orange and cobalt blue and what do you have? What else: "The Birth of the Universe."

It's the painting that completed your art final, and frankly, you couldn't have done it by yourself.

Afterwards, it's time for a little down-to-earth gratitude. You owe them at least a few Löwenbräus, not to mention the laundry bill.

Löwenbräu. Here's to good friends.

Celtics win over Denver

DENVER (AP) — Guards Gerald Henderson and Dennis Johnson each canned 10 points in the third quarter, and Larry Bird funneled in 28 as the Boston Celtics rolled over the Denver Nuggets 140-124 Tuesday night for their ninth NBA victory in a row.

The Celtics, who lost their season opener at Detroit, had to hold off a frenzied Denver rally in the middle of the final quarter to post the triumph.

The Nuggets cut an 18-point Boston lead to just five, 122-117, with 4:43 to go on a basket by Kiki Vandeweghe, who had 13 of his game-high 38 points in just three minutes of the Denver blitz.

But Boston reeled off nine straight points, starting with a three-point play by Robert Parish, to keep Denver at bay and won going away.

Boston hit 15 of its first 18 shots in the third period, after holding only a three-point lead at the half. They opened a lead that grew as large as 13 points in the quarter and took a 106-96 bulge into the final period.

Parish had 13 points and Bird got 12 and the Celtics hit 67 percent of their field goal attempts in first quarter. After Boston jumped to an early 19-12 edge, the Nuggets rallied to pull ahead 32-31 — their only lead of the night — on a basket by Vandeweghe. However, the Celtics moved on to 39-34 after the end of the first quarter.

Kevin McHale had 24 points for the winners, Henderson added 21, Parish added 18, and Johnson chipped in 16.

Alex English pumped in 19 points for the Nuggets,

Venerable general manager Red Auerbach would like nothing less then to shake the Commissioner's hand in a winning locker room one last time before retiring. The Green has a lot to prove after last year and seem intent on doing that.

1981's crown was a long time ago and the legions of Green fans are hungry for a celebration. Barring key injuries the Celtics seem ready to deliver, so sit back and enjoy the show.

Congratulations. You've just become a better photographer.

No need to change your equipment or your technique ...just try the new family of Kodacolor VR films.

Advances in color print film technology can help you get the best color pictures ever from Kodak films. Try all four new films in your 35 mm camera...and be a better photographer!

Kodak redefines sharpness. Kodacolor VR 100 film is the sharpest color negative film we've ever made. Ideal for big blowups with top quality.

Great for close-ups, anything where detail is important.

Kodak redefines versatility. Kodacolor VR 200 film has all the sharpness, fine grain, and color saturation you got with Kodacolor II film—with twice the speed. Great all-around performer.

Kodak redefines fast action. Kodacolor VR 400 film has wide exposure latitude, plus color that's even more saturated on underexposures, and grain that's even finer than Kodacolor 400 film. Ideal for stopping sports action, even with long telephoto lenses.

Kodak redefines low light. Kodacolor VR 1000 film is the fastest color print film in the world, for good pictures in low light, and when you need very high shutter speeds to stop action. An advanced, new emulsion technology enables the film to capture more light without the grain and loss in sharpness you'd normally expect with such a fast film! Try all four new films...and see all the ways you can be a better photographer!

Experienced frontcourt will be the key for the Minutemen

UP AND OVER — Edwin Green is one of the key players in the strong UMass front court and will be returning for his fourth season.

By BILL SHEA
Collegian Staff

Editor's Note: This is the second of a two part series previewing the 1983-84 University of Massachusetts basketball team which opens its season Saturday at 7:30 p.m. in the Cage against a Yugoslavian team, but not the National Team as previously reported. Today, the frontcourt.

If there was one aspect of the game of basketball which the University of Massachusetts basketball team consistently executed last year under Tom McLaughlin, it was rebounding.

Temple prevailed because Terrance Stansbury was burying three pointers. Rutgers beat UMass by forcing turnovers with pressure defenses. Rhode Island won because they made their foul shots down the stretch and UMass didn't.

But in none of their 20 losses last year did the University of Massachusetts lose a basketball game because they were out-rebounded. None.

New head coach Ron Gerlufsen knows that. He sees the Minutemen led the Atlantic Ten in rebounding last year. He sees leading rebounder Horace Neysmith returning with 8.5 rpg. He sees Edwin Green (7.7 rpg) and John Hempel return to the starting frontcourt and Bobby Braun coming off the bench.

He likes what he sees up front for UMass but others see differently.

They have visions of 6'9" sophomore Tom Emerson controlling the middle for UMass, dropping in soft jumpers and starting fast breaks with outlet passes. Gerlufson sees this too, but not right now.

"We want to bring him along slowly," Gerlufson said of his sophomore from Fork Union Military. "We know Tommy will help us in the future but right now we don't want to rush him."

There's no reason to rush Emerson because there's no place to put him. The experience frontcourt for UMass working as hard as we do, we'll be a team to reckon with," Turtle said. She uses video tapes to help the swimmers iron out faults in styles and to work on the smaller details.

The heart of the team will be returning veterans. Heading the list is a junior captain Elizabeth Feinberg. The freestyler took first in all four of her events in the season opener against the University of Vermont. Caroline Freitas, Rosemary Kelsall, and Valerie Niece are other top performers from a year ago.

Jeanne Bushee will be the team's star diver this year. She already set a school record for total points on the one and three meter boards in the season opening win against UVM.

Lori McCluskey and Teacey Anderson will aid UMass in the shorter distance races.

When asked to point out the stars of her squad, coach Turtle replied, "I'd rather not pick out any individuals. The entire team has worked really hard and I'm pleased with all of them." Turtle has alligned a tough schedule for her swimmers, dropping two weak teams in Clark and Southern Connecticut in favor of last years Division three National Champion Williams and UMaine, who finished in New England's top three last year.

UMass is 1-1 on the season so far and hosts UConn Friday at 7 p.m.

Swim team hosts UConn Friday

By JOHN BADGER
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts women's swim team is looking forward to a winning season this year. Although the team lost freestyler Jean Nicolai, diver Gina Parrone and backstrokers Anne Whitlock and Jennifer Black due to last semester's graduation, their replacements should pick up the slack.

"Although we don't have many new faces on the team, this year's returnees have all improved tremendously. I'm looking forward to having alot of school records broken this year," Coach Valerie Turtle said.

Among freshmen, Alison Uzzo stands out as someone to watch. The long distance free styler should be a force to reckon with in upcoming years.

The approach used by Coach Turtle plays a big part in how the team performs.

"We're a real hard working team. Every swimmer out there wants nothing less than a first place finish in their event."

Hard work is the key. This year Turtle has the team swimming more yardage at quicker intervals every practice.

"Strength and endurance are integral parts of swimming. There's some good talent on this team and by

Having to watch broom-waving Midwestern loud-mouths chant "Sweep, Sweep, Sweep," during the final game of the Celtics' semi-final demolition last May at the hands of the Milwaukee Bucks, did little to help my standing as a lifetime Green fanatic. But, after an off-season of change and the inspired start of the current campaign, I've re-established that old Celtic pride in my soul.

I know it's early in the seemingly forever NBA season but the Celtics' raucous romp through November (9-0 this month, 10-1 overall) has made my step a little lighter and the upcoming winter seem a little less colder.

The Celtics and the Sixers now stand alone atop the NBA. The Lakers have fallen from the Great Eight to the Struggling Seven with the trade of guard Norm Nixon and a host of injuries, least of which to center Kareem-Abdul Jabbar.

The Sixers have nothing left to prove. They dominated the NBA last season as Moses led them to the Promised Land. The Doctor has no goals left, he has his ring and finally the respect of everyone who said he couldn't win the big game. There were rumors that coach Billy Cunningham would hand in his clipboard but he's returned to make a run at back-to-back titles. I have to wonder about the Sixers' motivation going into this year. Also, their forward play is shaky.

Now the Celtics. Easy-going K.C. Jones has replaced drill instructor Bill Fitch and it shows. The Celts seem to be enjoying round-ball more these days and of course they're winning too. Crybaby Tiny Archibald has joined the Bucks after being released. Add All-Star guard Dennis Johnson, drop burly Rick Robey and his lack of offense and maybe, just maybe it's time to reserve a spot for another banner.

The biggest factor, by far, has been the play of one Larry Bird. The NBA's best player has taken it upon himself to win games. He did say that he would punish himself during the off-season to improve the team and no one can say he hasn't done that. Sir Larry has been scoring at an awesome clip, handing out a bundle of assists and rebounding like a bull. Robert Parish and Kevin McHale have ironed out their contracts and have only hoop on their minds.

The only weak spot of the team last year was the guard play. Now, with the steady two way play of Johnson, a renewed Quinn Buckner and a budding superstar in Gerald Henderson, the Celtics are solid. Danny Ainge is a capable backup and Carlos Clark can sell popcorn with Greg Kite. Dependable Cedric Maxwell can be counted on at forward and Scott Wedman and M.L. Carr know their roles.

BOPPIN' IN THE '80's -- MTV couldn't have done better last night at the FAC -- UMass had its own prime veejays and performers in new wave's fruggin' Fab Five, the B-52's, who swayed a sold out crowd to a one hour galactic frenzy. Fred Schneider, Kate Pierson, Keith Strickland, and Ricky and Cindy Wilson traversed through favorites of their four dance music albums, and came out for two encores. Bouffants, Bermuda shorts and the nostalgic attraction of the group made the crowd reluctant to leave as "Rock Lobster", "Dance This Mess Around" and "Private Idaho," vintage 52 tunes, dominated by FAC standards, was fairly well-behaved.

60 million to view "The Day After"

"The seventeenth century was the century of mathematics, the eighteenth century that of the physical sciences and the nineteenth that of biology. Our twentieth is the century of fear."

Never before has a television show had the potential to change history. The attention focused on the ABC movie "The Day After", to be aired at 8:00 p.m., Sunday, is unequaled. An estimated 60 million people, more than the number of voters in the last Presidential election, will look on as the people of rural Kansas have their lives destroyed by nuclear war.

Since its conception, "The Day After" has been in the national media spotlight. Much has been made of its inability to draw advertisers. From the cover of the current Newsweek to the smallest weekly newspaper it has blossomed into more than just a movie. "The Day After" has become a national event.

At the University of Massachusetts, the UMass Peacemakers have organized public viewing and discussions following the film. Television sets located on campus include the first floor lounge area and Room 917 of the Campus Center, where discussions will follow in both places. Sets are also located in the Newman Center and in dormitory lounges.

"From what I've heard, the movie is devastating," said Peacemakers spokesperson Danny King. "We just want to be around to listen and share the feelings of people who have seen it. We want to talk about this movie and what people can do to prevent nuclear war," he said.

King said he feels the movie will confirm the worst fears people have regarding nuclear war and that mass depression will result.

"If we can channel this depression into something positive then we'll have accomplished something big," King said.

Resident Directors are being asked to prepare for possible outbreaks of violence or acts of vandalism as a result of seeing the film. The UMass Mental Health Center and University Health Services will have additional staff personnel to cope with the expected need. Some Resident Assistants have been issued news articles telling how to deal with despair among students who view the movie.

Rally scheduled to protest plans for state school

By PETER ABRAHAM

BELCHERTOWN - Up to 1,000 people are expected to gather Sunday on Town Common to protest State plans for new construction at the Belchertown State School and emphasize the success that the mentally handicapped have had with community living programs.

According to Carol Shelton, a member of the Committee in Support of Community Living, the rally's sponsor, the Belchertown State School now holds 420 people and the proposed construction there would make it impossible for these individuals to receive treatment from within their community.

"It's a matter of being cost effective," Shelton said. "If they (the Commonwealth) go through with this building, then they will be forced to keep people in there to show that the money was wisely spent."

A study released this month by the University of Massachusetts Department of communication studies showed that 73 percent of the people polled said the mentally retarded should get treatment from the local community, while 16 percent felt that they should be institutionalized.

"We are in the majority and the people in the minority have been the ones that those in charge at the Legislature have been listening to. This gathering will show that we have a voice and are deeply concerned about this matter," Shelton said.

"Should this proposal go through then it's another 50 years of institutions," Shelton said. "We feel that the money could be put to better use by funding community support programs for the mentally handicapped."

The State School in Belchertown had a budget of $31 million last year and Shelton said her group supports community living not only because it's more effective with the handicapped but because it would be cheaper then funding institutions.

"President Reagan signed a law making (medicaid) pay for roughly half of the community services and Massachusetts is one of only 20 states not to take steps to implement this law. The Statehouse will just create jobs and keep existing payrolls intact with their plans," Shelton said.

Currently community service programs have been running using the same amount of funding they received two years ago. "There has not been any increases in two years," said Shelton, a UMass graduate and current staff member at a vocational work program.

"We have to make it known what is happening and that the State should disband the old institution system in favor of community services, hopefully the rally will accomplish this," Shelton said.

Sen. Jack Backman, chair of the Committee on Human Services has been invited to address the crowd along with Dr. Gunnar Dybwad, Professor Emeritus at Brandeis University, and an internationally known expert on the subject of mental retardation. Parents and former patients at the school will speak as well. A march to the gate of the State School will begin the rally, and bad weather will move the proceedings to the Belchertown High School.

Hersh notes unfair power

By PAUL BASKEN
Collegian Staff

The press in the United States is far too weak and the presidency is far too strong for the former to keep an effective check on the latter, according to a Pulitzer Prize-winning journalist who has made a specialty of government exposes.

In a visit yesterday to the University of Massachusetts to publicize his latest book, The Price of Power, Seymour Hersh discussed the dangers presented by this imbalance of power as he saw it not only during Richard Nixon's administration, but throughout all recent presidencies. The book, which deals primarily with Nixon's secretary of state, Henry Kissinger, caused national controversy upon its release this summer. Among other things, the book made allegations of a deal in which Gerald Ford was maneuvered into the presidency by Nixon in exchange for the pardon he received after his 1974 resignation during impeachment proceedings.

Although Hersh did not address that specific point in his speech to more than 200 people in Memorial Hall, he discussed a list of illegal activities Nixon conducted in his five and a half years, and the administration's arrogance in carrying them out.

"There seemed to be no limit," Hersh said of the activities which included the secret bombing of Cambodia during the Vietnam War, phone tappings, and the famous break-in at the Watergate Hotel.

After detailing the offenses he researched on Nixon in writing his book, Hersh extended to Ronald Reagan the trend of absolute authority he said was seized by the presidency in the 1960s.

"Since John Kennedy, we've given our presidents, Democratic and Republican, two basic rights," Hersh said. These, he said, are "the right to lie to the American people and the press and the Congress," and in specifically dealing with the military, the right "to send our boys anywhere without consulting Congress."

French jets bomb Shiite fighters

BEIRUT, Lebanon (AP) — French jets bombed, rocketed and strafed Shiite Moslem guerrillas holed up in a barracks and a hotel in the Bekaa Valley Thursday in reprisal for the suicide attacks on French, U.S. and Israeli troops. Lebanese police said at least 39 were killed and 150 wounded in the raids on camps of the pro-Iranian extremists.

The French raids were mounted a day after Israeli jets pounded the same area, leaving 43 dead, and moments after a massive funeral procession in the city of Baalbek during which a shiite Moslem guerrilla leader threatened more suicide attacks against the French, Americans and Israelis.

Andropov reportedly shot in arm

LONDON (AP) — The Daily Express said today there are reports that Soviet President Yuri V. Andropov has not appeared in public for three months because he was shot in the arm by Leonid Brezhnev's son, who was reported furious over KGB allegations of moral and financial corruption.

The Daily Express said it based its article on reports that emanated from Moscow KGB sources, and that these reports had spread through intelligence circles in London and elsewhere in Europe. The article was headlined, "Was Andropov Shot?"

There was no comment from Soviet officials, but Yuri Brezhnev's office in Moscow said he still held his job as first deputy foreign trade minister, which tended to cast doubt on the report.

The Daily Express said the Brezhnevs "are reported to have nursed a bitter grudge against Andropov because they believe that when he was head of the KGB he tried to implicate them in allegations of moral and financial corruption."

Arms talks to resume Wednesday

GENEVA, Switzerland (AP) — U.S. arms negotiator Paul H. Nitze met for more than two hours with Soviet Ambassador Yuli A. Kvitsinsky today and afterwards said the talks on limiting medium-range nuclear missiles will resume next Wednesday.

"They are continuing," Nitze said on returning from the Soviet mission to U.S. delegation headquarters.

The meeting next week would come one day after West Germany's parliament concludes debates on accepting U.S. cruise and Pershing 2 missiles. West German arms experts have said the Soviets consider that the "cut off" date for the talks in Geneva.

The Soviets have repeatedly threatened to walk out of the talks when new U.S. missiles are deployed in Europe, but are apparently waiting for the debates in West Germany. The first cruise missiles arrived in Great Britain on Monday.

Today's session followed a 35- minute meeting Tuesday — the shortest plenary meeting in more than 100 negotiating sessions since the intermediaterange nuclear force talks began two years ago.

Mexico fears unrest in Chiapas

TUXTLA GUTIERREZ, Mexico (AP) - The Mexican government is pumping money into the impoverished southern state of Chiapas, concerned that poverty could be the seed for social unrest along the border with strife-plagued Central America.

"If there is a seedbed for revolution in Mexico, it is Chiapas," said a state official who asked not to be identified because of political reasons.

"We have neglected this area for centuries, and there are great social problems that must be resolved."

The government has invested $900 million in development projects in Chiapas state this year - twice as much in dollar terms as is 1982. Officials say the effort is to improve communications and step up social services in an area affected by an influx of Central American refugees and by protests of Mexican leftist and peasant groups.

Classified Carter papers found

WASHINGTON (AP) — Classified foreign policy documents from the Carter administration have been discovered in files from President Reagan's 1980 election campaign, according to the head of a House investigation.

"We've found some 'your eyes only' type of stuff. That means classified — the highest classification," said Rep. Donald J. Albosta, D-Mich., chairman of the human resources subcommittee of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee.

Forty rowdy demonstrators were dragged away to police vans in Boston after delaying a Bus for an hour.

In Philadelphia, hundreds of strikers joined by sympathetic unionized plumbers.

Lane Bonner, an FBI spokesman, said he had no comment on the congressman's statements.

Albosta made the statements in an interview Wednesday after announcing that Jan. 26 is the tentative date for the start of public hearings that could see both Carter and Reagan White House officials called to testify under oath.

Empty Greyhound buses attacked

Greyhound buses — many of them virtually empty — pulled out of stations to the jeers of union members today for the first time since a strike halted the nation's largest intercity bus line two weeks ago. Sixty demonstrators were arrested, and two were injured.

About 300 rain-drenched strikers struggled with riot-clad police in San Francisco. A rock shattered the window of one bus, and baggage handlers were pelted with bottles.

Mayor-elect meets with Dukakis

BOSTON (AP) — Raymond Flynn met with Gov. Michael S. Dukakis Thursday for the first time since his election as mayor of Boston, and both men pledged to work closely on problems that affect the state's largest city.

"We want very much to make this relationship work. You can't have a healthy Boston without a healthy Massachusetts, and vice versa," Dukakis said after the two men and their wives dined on seafood and white wine during an 80-minute private luncheon at the Statehouse.

Flynn, a city councilor who served in the Legislature during Dukakis' first term, noted the governor had twice gone through a transition period before taking office. He said he hoped to pick up some pointers.

Consul not charged with assault

BOSTON (AP) — The Dominican Republic's consul here has diplomatic immunity and therefore can't be prosecuted for an alleged assault on a police officer, the state's high court ruled Thursday.

The decision upheld a Boston Municipal Court judge who dismissed the 1982 charge against Rafael Jerez.

The court based its immunity conclusion on a provision of the Vienna Convention that states:

"Consular officers and consular employees shall not be amenable to the jurisdiction or administrative authorities of the receiving states in respect of acts performed in the exercise of consular functions."

Jerez went to the consulate's office in a downtown building after business hours to pick up a flag and other material to bring to a function in the Brighton section of the city April 18, 1982. He declined to sign in with a security guard, who told a police officer he thought Jerez was a trespasser.

The officer approached Jerez, who was chatting with a Colombian occicial seated in an automobile outside the building.

SWAG discusses new study space,

By ANDREW WOLFF
Collegian Correspondent

Creation of study space in the Bershire Dining Common and the relocation of WZZZ, the Southwest radio station, were discussed last night by the Southwest Area Government (SWAG) assembly.

SWAG co-presidents Mike Bean and Dave McCarthy said that in an effort to help solve the campus-wide problem of limited study space, the Berkshire Dining Common in Southwest will be opened as study space by Monday.

"There have been some red tape problems of late," McCarthy said, "but everything seems to be going as planned."

Bean said although the opening is planned for Monday, there has been a delay due to poor communication among SWAG, Dean of Students William Field, Food Services and University security.

"People have been left in the dark about this thing," Bean said, "ane I feel responsible."

Bean said there is concern in University Food Services about students ruining the equipment used for meals. Marie Cappadona, director of Food Services, said she wants to be assured there will be adequate security during the study hours before she gives final approval to open the D.C., Bean said. Bean also said Cappadona feels she has not been consulted enough throughout the discussions about proper security.

Dean Field informed SWAG that Berkshire, once open, will be used on a three-week trial basis, Bean said. During that time, security personnel will be taking a survey of the students who use the facility.

"If enough students use the area, Dean Field will let us keep it open," Bean said.

McCarthy discussed relocating the Southwest radio station WZZZ from John Quincy Adams Tower to the Hampden Student Center lobby, a move that would help the area government achieve its goal of making Hampden a student center and not a building for the University to use, he said.

Food Services has proposed moving its large main service computer into the Hampden Craft Shop area, a move that Bean and McCarthy said they see as a continued effort by the University to take student space.

"Between the I.D. office that we now have in here, and this proposal for the computer, we see this as a double whammie from the University," Bean said. "I feel confident, though, that we won't lose our space."

Crampton hit with 8th fire since Sept

University of Massachusetts police responded to a report of a fire from residents in Crampton dormitory in the Southwest Residential Area at 1:08 a.m. Thursday. Police said a bulletin board on the second floor of the south wing was lighted on fire, causing $15 worth of damage. The Amherst Fire Department and the Environmental Health and Safety Department were also on the scene. There are no suspects.

Seven fires occurred in Crampton from Sept. 25 to Oct. 18, according to police. The fires were all contained in trash barrels on the second and third floors. Cashin dormitory in the Sylvan Residential Area had six fires from Nov. 1 to Nov. 8. Fires on Nov. 1, 2 and 6 were in trashcans. Bulletins boards were set on fire Nov. 3 and 7. A flaming paper bag was stuffed into a fire extinguisher cabinet Nov. 8.

Two fires were also reported in Grayson dormitory in the Orchard Hill Residential Area Nov. 9. On Nov. 10 fires were reported in women's bathrooms on the Campus Center Concourse and the Student Union Building.

"These fires are all under investigation," said Amherst Fire Chief Victor Zambruski. "Crampton and Cashin are being watched. The information is being handled through the District Attorney's office," he said.

UMass Director of Public Safety Gerald T. O'Neil expressed the department's concern for students' safety.

"Of course these fires are being given priority. We have yet, however, to apprehend or identify those persons responsible for setting the fires," O'Neil said.

Students crowd CASIAC

By STEPHEN HOWE
Collegian Staff

Pre-registration period is here and the lines are forming.

At 2:30 Thursday afternoon, more than 50 people crammed into the College of Arts and Science Information and Advising Center (CASIAC) and the crowd was spilling out into the hallway. Students waiting to speak to one of the three advisors on duty were told to sign a waiting list and informed there would be a two hour wait.

"During this period they should have a lot more advisers," Marne Goodman, a first year student who had been waiting for more than an hour, said. "I came here early in the morning like they suggested and the place was jammed."

Julie Berwald, assistant to the dean, admitted pre-registration period does pose some problems for the CASIAC and that "it's always been this way."

"I think it's bad to have students have to wait two hours," Berwald said. "It's a ridiculous wait but I don't know how else to do it."

Berwald said that when she came to UMass in 1975, CASIAC had to advise 3200 students with undeclared majors. That number has since increased to more than 5000 but the advising staff has not increased at all. There are currently about 15 faculty advisers available for shifts of two hours a week.

"Many students get tired of waiting and walk away without ever seeing an advisor,"and then have to struggle to work out academic problems on their own, Berwald said.

Meeting the needs of large numbers of students during pre-registration is also a problem for the Registrar's Office, said Administrative Assistant Marion Markwell.

"Starting (Friday) we'll be jam packed from the time we open until the time we close," Markwell said. "During the last two days of pre-registration our office will be knee-deep in people and the whole lobby will be filled."

Markwell said if her office has enough staff it will try to have staff people in the lobby to collect forms and assist the 11,000 to 12,000 students whom she predicts will be coming to the Registrar's Office the final days of pre-registration, which ends at 5 p.m. Wednesday.

" Survival " motion passed

By SEAN CASEY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Graduate Student Senate (GSS) passed a motion last night condemning the deployment of missiles in Europe, despite the question of "political issues" being raised.

The motion was presented by Phyllis Rodin, a graduate student who was involved with the senate for six semesters before leaving this fall.

"This is not a political question, it's a question of survival," Rodin said when the political nature of the motion was questioned. "I hope we can go beyond partisan differences to be humanists."

Although there were four abstentions to the motion which passed 18 to 0, some senators pointed out that this issue is not a current issue, but it has been around as one senator said "before many of us were born," and therefore did not have to be questioned at length, he said.

"The senators should know how their constituencies feel on this issue by now," said an said the unidentified senator

When some senators raised the issue of a worldwide balance of power, Rodin clarified that her motion refered to missiles from any country.

"I'd like to see the U.S. take the lead," she said.

Rodin mentioned the women's sit-in at Greenham, England as an example of the European oppostition to the missiles, calling the sit-in, "an exciting thing happening with the women's movement."

"They are not trying to be sensationalists or frighten you. They're trying to tell you what the danger is," she said.

"No one here knows what the war (World War II) was like close up because it wasn't fought on our lands," Rodin said.

"The American people don't know what it's like to have short-range missiles aimed at them, because none are positioned in Canada or even Cuba," said Cristos Karastamatis, a graduate student from Greece.

Also at the meeting, literature was distributed about "The Day After," an ABC movie depicting the effects of nuclear war.

BOG gears for budget war

By RALPH ROBERTS
Collegian Staff

The Board of Governors (BOG) is getting ready for their annual "budget war" with the Campus Center adminstration, Chair Mike Reilly said last evening at the BOG meeting.

Similiar to the past years, the BOG will soon begin an attempt to keep student fees at their present rate, but due to Campus Center administration actions, this may be difficult to accomplish Reilly said.

"The administration has had an annual policy of under-budgeting many Campus Center groups, not only the BOG," he said.

Reilly said that when the BOG's budget gets cut, the United Program's Council, the Governor's Program Council, the Craft Shop, the Art Gallery, and the Cable Station all get penalized because they operate within the BOG.

"We have enough problems operating with the tight budget they give us now. If they squeeze us any tighter, it will probably raise student fees anywhere from $10 to $20," he said.

One of the major concerns of the BOG is keeping student fees down, but in the past, it has been difficult for them to give it their full attention he said. Because the Campus Center's annual budget meeting takes place a few weeks before final exams begin, it is a busy time academically for almost all students, Reilly said.

"I find it kind of odd and very irritable that budgeting is scheduled at this time of year. They couldn't have chosen a worse time to do it.

"While it's admirable that the administration is very careful with their spending money, they also must consider that these groups need this money to stay alive," Reilly said.

Anti-choice wrong, says prof

By MICHELLE HYDE
Collegian Staff

Anti-choice "rhetoric" ignores the rights of women and makes the fetus sacred in their belief that a fertilized egg is a person, according to Ann Ferguson, a professor of philosophy at the University of Massachusetts.

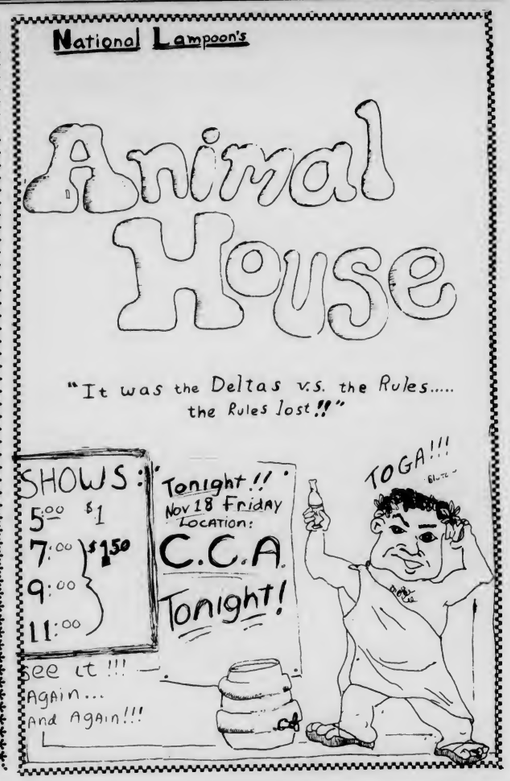
Ferguson spoke Thursday at a slide show presentation which was the second in a series of lunchtime discussions on childcare and reproductive rights sponsored by the Women's Task Force of the Democratic Socialist Association and the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA).

The Human Life Amendment which would give a fertilized egg the same rights as a person is among many constitutional amendments being sponsored by over 100 members of Congress that would wipe out the Supreme Court's 1973 ruling which legalized abortion, she said.

"A million teenagers become pregnant every year in the United States and 70 percent of teenage mothers never finish high school," she said.

"Under the egg-as-person law (HLA) you would be forced to carry a pregnancy to term even if you have a disease such as cancer, or if your doctor says the baby will be born fatally ill, or grossly deformed," she said.

"The fertilized egg has a life, but it is a blueprint that contains a genetic code," she said. "A blueprint is no building and the egg does not have the qualities o personhood and the ability to relate."



Ferguson said, "The rhetoric about respect for life ignores the already living woman as if she were a non-person and the fetus is made sacred."

She identified various tactics used by anti-choice supporters. The charges that abortion is murder and that women who have abortions are "baby killers" depend upon the acceptance that a fertilized egg is a person, she said. Anti-choice supporters also magnify pictures of an aborted fetus to give "false, sensational impressions" of a fully developed baby, she said.

But "ninety-one percent of all abortions in the United States are done in the first twelve weeks of a pregnancy," she said.

The most revealing, most intimate study of men and women in America since the Kinsey Report.

How are today's couples different? Have the sexual revolution and the women's movement spawned new ways of coping with earning a living, managing money, and making love? Or do today's couples find traditional values a protective port in such stormy times? To find out, a team of sociologists spent nearly a decade delving into the private lives of more than 6,000 ordinary American couples in every region of the country. In every case, both partners were consulted. Married, living together, and homosexual couples all took part, many in day-long in-depth interviews. Now the results are out in a book that gives American couples an often surprising look at themselves.

— Both men and women feel it is the husband's responsibility to provide for his wife. If the man is not a good provider, the relationship may be in jeopardy.

☐ Women do most of the housework, even if both partners have full-time jobs. The more household chores a man has to perform, the less happy he is likely to be with the relationship.

☐ The money that a working woman brings home earns her power in the household and respect from her partner—unless she makes enough to threaten his dominant role.

☐ Extramarital sex tells very little about the state of a relationship.

☐ Couples who attend church or synagogue are no more likely to be monogamous than those who do not.

☐ The power of physical beauty never wanes. Except in long-term relationships, people who find their partners attractive say they have a better sex life.

"Although Blumstein and Schwartz undertook AMERICAN COUPLES as a serious scientific study, they hope people will 'read it in bed' and use it to shed light on their own relationships," Newsweek reports, adding, "Much of the book is devoted to the couples' own descriptions of their lives, which gives the work an intimate, confiding quality almost like a therapy session." Exceptionally candid, unprecedented in its scope, and invaluable in its insights, AMERICAN COUPLES shows how we live today—and what it will take to live better tomorrow. "A distinguished work, careful and caring."

★ DAY AFTER

Whether or not these preparations are needed remains to be seen. But people who have seen the movie or its previews report they experienced "deep emotional shock and a sense of hopelessness." ABC plans an announcement that "The Day After" may not be suitable for children under 12 and some promotional posters recommend that "This film should not be viewed alone."

The story written by Edward Hume, is largely based on a Congressional study by the United States Office of Technology Assessment titled, "The Effects of Nuclear War."

The plot involves how people of Lawrence, Kansas are affected when a one megaton missle airbursts over Kansas City, Missouri, 38 miles away. The movie has been criticized because it is optimistic –Kansas City would actually be the target of a 20 megaton assault. Director Nicholas Meyer, in an interview with the New Age Journal, admitted this discrepancy saying, "If you told this story accurately, there would be no story."

The movie stars Jason Robards and Jobeth Williams as people who live through the attack and are forced to cope with the resulting desolation. The film shows the survivors facing radiation sickness, virulent epidemics, inadequate health care, limited food and water and the outbreaks of violence that occur. These physical hardships are compounded with the numbness and feelings of hopelessness that the world they know is destroyed.

Meyer said he hopes the film will "win converts to the anti-nuclear cause." He is not alone in this opinion as hundreds of national peace organizations are using the film as a basis for discussions about stopping nuclear warfare.

·ABC itself will have a special "Viewpoint" with Ted Koppel to give both the anti-nuclear and the conservative views about the movie and its consequences.

Locally "The Day After" can be seen on channels 5 and 40.

★ HERSH

"How do you convince people?" Hersh asked before his speech in discussing the need to get people to question their government and its ability to hide virtually whatever it wants from the media.

"Most people think the press has too much power," he said.

"You can rough them up a little on the fringes, but you can't really get at them," Hersh said of the administration. But, he said, "you can't blame the President from doing what he wants."

Hersh's appearance was sponsored by the Distinguished Visitors Program.

Three car accident injures two

A three car accident Wednesday on Belchertown Road injured two drivers, Amherst Police reported.

Police said the 12:38 p.m. accident occurred when the first vehicle, operated by Ellen Moore, 33, of Amherst, had slowed down to turn and a second automobile, driven by Phyllis Shermeta, 20, struck it from behind. Moore's car continued into the eastbound lane, striking a third vehicle, driven by Gino Renda, 21, of Greenbrook, NJ. Renda's vehicle hit both cars. Police said Moore and Shermeta were taken to Cooley Dickensen Hospital in Northampton and released.

Police also reported the theft of a pair of grey warmup pants from Wildwater Outfitters on East Pleasant Street. Police said the pants, valued at $30, were allegedly taken by three youths aged 16 to 20, though the suspects were not seen taking them. ·GREG BROWN

The day after- any winners?

Some of you may already be familiar with the controversy surrounding the ABC movie "The Day After". The picture, which portrays the aftermath of a nuclear explosion in Kansas, has been criticized for various reasons.

Some groups have said the movie is too pessimistic, and that it overdramatizes what would really happen after a nuclear holocaust. Others claim the movie is not graphic enough in its depiction of the devastation and horrors that would follow a nuclear explosion. Pro-nuclear groups, like the Moral Majority, have announced their plans to boycott the film because of its "unpatriotic" and "unamerican" overtone.

Miriam Zoll

Regardless of the criticisms made against the movie, its plot and general theme address an issue many Americans, and millions of people throughout the world are concerned with: a nuclear war or nuclear holocaust.

The Reagan Administration has repeatedly told the American public that a nuclear war would be "survivable." But numerous medical and science organizations, including the American Medical Association and the National Academy of Sciences, have concluded that there is no effective way to save our people in the event of nuclear war. Medical groups claim that after a nuclear detonation, the food and water supplies would be contaminated with radioactive materials. "Survivors" would be surrounded by millions of dead bodies, about 100 million, in addition to millions of blind and other injured people. Health epidemics would skyrocket because of the massive number of corpses, and the remaining medical personnel would not be able to adequately nurse the sick and dying. In other words, the survivors of a nuclear war or accident would be the losers, not the winners.

Despite all of the medical and scientific evidence that says a nuclear war is not survivable, the Reagan Administration has proposed a seven year, 4.2 billion dollar civil defense program they claim will save 80 percent of the population. The Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA), is responsible for the civil defense and evacuation procedures. According to FEMA, in the event of a nuclear disaster, two-thirds of the American population would be relocated to rural areas. They would be expected to bring along items such as "insurance policies, stocks and bonds, shovels, and building materials to construct fallout shelters in the host area." FEMA even suggests people bring their wills -- just in case.

One of the main flaws in the FEMA plan is that the complete evacuation of approximately 150,000,000 million Americans would take a little less than a week to complete, but it only takes a Soviet missile a half hour to reach the United States. The FEMA handbook also mentions a "blast shelter program" that would protect about 4 million "essential" workers, who would continue to carry on industrial activity after the explosion. The other Americans who are not considered "essential," are advised to build makeshift fallout shelters by "digging trenches under cars, building a log cabin, or hiding under tables."

According to Dr. Bruce Clayton, a FEMA-certified Radiological Defense Officer, "...few civil defense professionals think the plans will actually work. Many of them will tell you quite candidly that they are writing the plans only because their federal funding is contingent upon it." The general opinion about the civil defense program is that it can not protect people from nuclear attack in the ways it says it can. Even if people could remain isolated from the radioactive fallout, the food and water supplies would be contaminated, and the environment would be un fit for life to exist. Some scientists, however, have pointed out there are certain kinds of insects that might be able to endure the intense heat and fallout.

The producer of "The Day After", Robert Papazian, says the film is not about politics and that it doesn't pretend to be. "It is," he said, "simply a quantum leap into the effects of nuclear holocaust." Maybe ABC, and the director and producer of the movie don't want to officially declare that the film is "political," but it seems more than coincidental that it is being aired six days after the first US made Euromissiles were deployed to Greenham Common in England.

Putting politics aside, the content of the film has prompted some educators and psychologists to urge parents not to allow their children to watch the flick. They have also advised that adults don't watch the movie alone, but with a group of friends, or in a church or community center. Obviously, people who have previewed the movie believe it will have great emotional, and maybe political, impact on American television viewers.

Good luck if you plan to watch.....

Help stamp out dorm fires

There have been so many fires intentionally set in recent weeks that every time one is lit, it is reacted to with more and more apathy. Fear and apprehension about the potential damage of these fires has turned to indifference, and even mild amusement. But enough is enough.

Students must take an active role in finding the perpetrator(s) of these acts of arson, a very serious criminal offense. Helping to distinguish between the real arsonists and extremely demented pranksters who like to "pour gas on a lit fire" -- (no pun intended) is as important a problem as finding the real crooks.

When in and around your dorm, particularly at night, be aware! Keep an eye out for strangers on your floor, in the laundry, bathroom, or any other place people shouldn't use as hangouts. Don't hesitate to ask people what they're doing or whom they are visiting -- just explain to them why you are concerned -- they might be able to help as well.

Don't be afraid to get your Resident Assistant, or call Campus Security or Amherst police. This is an extremely serious problem that merits extensive, perhaps costly investigation. But the students themselves must help, too.

As it is, people don't respond to fire alarms, and this recent barrage of arson has made the problem drastically worse. The more often something happens, the less seriously it is taken. Hopefully no one's injury or death will have to occur before this problem is seen in as serious light as it should be.

So try to help. Let's find these deranged individuals before they can hurt some one. Just think -- at the very least you might save yourself a trip outside one brisk night for a fire alarm that you think is fake.

Love is a many splendored thing

Lorraine floated across her Z-room to the closet and flung open its doors. She was preparing for a dinner date with the newest love of her life. She did not walk, tread, step, stride, stroll, traverse, or ambulate. She floated.

"What are you going to wear?" I asked. Lorraine regards every day as sort of a mini-Halloween. She'll go to class clothed in anything from a tux to a baseball uniform. I could hardly wait to see the costume she'd chosen for her rendevouz with Mr. Right.

Elizabeth Luciano

"Something conservative," she said, pulling on a preppie sweater, "I may as well look rational, since God knows how I'll act. I've got this talent for doing really dumb things on dates."

"Like what?" I asked, surprised.

"Well, last month I went to the movies with Dennis, from my calculus class. He fell down the stairs on the way out the dorm." She tugged her skirt into place.

"So? That wasn't your fault," I told her.

"I started laughing," she admitted, "It wasn't funny or anything, I was just nervous. He never asked me out again, though." She started glopping on some Maybelline before continuing.

"That wasn't as bad as the time I went to the Pub with Jeff. My roommate fixed me up with him. I went to the women's room and accidently flushed my keycase down the toilet," she said.

"You're kidding!" I unsympathetically chuckled.

"It wasn't funny," she reprimanded me, turning back to the mirror, "He had to break into my room with his I.D. I had to pay for the dorm key, too." She tossed a pack of Marlboro Lights into her pocketbook. "Oh, that reminds me of another one."

"What?" I prompted, finding her tales of woe highly entertaining.

"When I was at a party last summer, I ran into a guy I used to have a tremendous crush on. His name's Michael, and he's a fox." she paused, partially for emphasis, and partially to brush her hair. "Anyway, he was outside in the backyard, smoking a joint, and he offered me some."

"Yeah?" I could tell this story was going to be a classic.

"I took a hit off the lit end." Lorraine hesitated for a moment. "It didn't hurt, but I was pretty embarrassed."

Her reverie was interrupted by a knock at the door.

"That's him!" she hissed, "He's fifteen minutes early! He can't see you here!" she whispered, panic-stricken.

"Why not?" I asked.

"It'll look like you're babysitting me!" she rapidly squirted on some Ambush.

"Aren't I?" I said. Without answering, Lorraine grabbed me by the arm and shoved me into her closet. I sat amidst her high heels and odd assortment of garments, listening while she let him in.

"Hi, Steve!" she sang, as if I weren't painfully hunched down, still trying to adjust to the dark. "Is it terribly chily outside?" Oh, God. She'd actually started talking about the weather. How unoriginal!

"It's freezing," the unseen hero proclaimed. "You're going to need a jacket."

"Oh, no I won't!" Lorraine said quickly.

"I don't want you to catch a cold," Steve said, "Let me get your coat for you."

That's when he opened the closet door.

Letters

One last "pidgeon" letter

To the Editor,

Bravo to the First Shift Janitors for their enlightening Letter to the Editor November 16. Now the other victims of the pidgeon saga would like to speak out.

The women of the Student Activities Office would like to set their side of the story straight. First of all, we DID NOT contact the Collegian to complain about the presence of the janitors on the heaters in the hallway. The Collegian called us! We were informed by the reporter that people in the SGA had complained initially and she was checking other offices for other opinions. She also informed us that she did not know what she was going to do with the information, and that she was very busy. She didn't even know if she was definitely doing an article on this topic. Imagine our surprise to see the headline on the front page the very next day. Our office and our office only, three women representing ALL women in the SAO, attacking the presence of the janitors in the hallways.

When the story escalated to the point where there was the presence of a live pidgeon, complete with feathers, in our office one morning, we all knew something had to be done. I told Michele to talk to the janitors, find out why they chose to sit there, if they did indeed have a break room and was it a decent break room. Of course those quotes were never told.

For all those other people who inundated our office with phone calls of support, wanting to start workshops, and wishing to sign our petition -- thanks, but no thanks. We do not have a petition and do not wish to have any part in workshops. We admit that the janitors choice to sit in the hallway is an irritant for some of us and has been for quite awhile. However, we feel we have larger concerns for oppression and sexism on this campus. This particular situation is not high on our priority list of things that need change at UMass.

The last point I would like to make is that the most unfortunate consequence concerning this particular lack of responsibility on the part of the Collegian, is that it has pit workers against workers. UMass employees share a common interest at UMass, and that is seeking comfortable and fair conditions on this campus. We cannot afford to be against each other. Let us hope that the damage in our relationships that this has caused is not unalterable.

Physicist discusses Isreali reaction to Lebanon invasion

By CAMDEN PIERCE
Collegian Staff

The Israeli invasion of Lebanon has caused a war which is immoral and is causing a polarization of Jews in Israel, according to an Israeli physicist who lectured Thursday night at the University of Massachusetts.

"This is the first war in which there was not clear support for the war from the Israeli population," said Yakov Pipman, who has ties to a number of progressive organizations in Israel. He is presently employed by a cancer research firm in New York City.

Over 100,000 people participated in a demonstration in Israel condemning the invasion, Pipman said. He said that in a country the size of Israel, it is the same as a demonstration of 10 million people in the United States.

The invasion of Lebanon was rooted in the ideology of the Zionist Movement, Pipman said.

"Zionism wanted to create a state for Jews in Palestine, and not defend or represent the interests of people already there," he said.

- Yakov Pipman Collegian photo by Drew Ogier

The polarization has occurred between "those who think Israel should deal with Arabs with force, and those who want new fresh air in the scene. It is common knowledge that the main purpose of the invasion was to destroy the PLO," he said.

Israel has control over 400,000 Palestinians in the West Bank, the Gaza Strip and Israel, Pipman said. He said Israel is holding more than 10,000 people in connection with the Lebanese war. These people have been interned in camps, and denied human rights, he said.

The people have been refused prisoner of war status, so the Geneva conventions do not apply, and they have also been denied civilian status. Pipman said these people are known as "those who were brought in," and have only recently been allowed to talk with lawyers, at their own expense.

Besides the elimination of the PLO, the Israeli government was also urged to invade Lebanon by the United States, he said.

"Increased activity in the U.S. gave Israel the green light to go ahead," he said.

Pipman said the war in Lebanon was a testing ground for Israeli weapons. He said 35 to 40 percent of Israel's total exports are arms related, expected to amount to $2 billion worth of business in 1984. He said the weapons functioned well in the invasion, and Israeli arms manufacturers are now advertising in military magazines as "bombs you can count on."

Student shares travel encounters

By BROOKE STATES
Collegian Staff

Some University of Massachusetts students have an opportunity to do more than just read about what is happening in Central America. Thanks to a program through the University of Kansas, UMass students like Beth Benton can go to Central America and learn what is really going on.

"In Nicaragua we were obviously two Americans because of the accents of our Spanish. I expected to be met with hostility, but people welcomed us. They were glad we were there so that we could see for ourselves what was going on," Benton said.

Benton said government officials she talked to at the Nicaraguan embassy in Costa Rica and in Nicaragua encouraged her to find out more information.

"They told me 'I can tell you what I think is going on, but if you want to know you have to go and ask questions," she said.

Benton, a 21 year-old social thought and political economy major from Birmingham, Alabama spent eight months in Central America. She was in Costa Rica for 6 and a half months, for two weeks in Nicaragua during the celebrations for the fourth anniversary of the Sandinista revolution, and in Guatamala for ten days, right before the coup that toppled Christian fundamentalist Rios Mott from power. Costa Rica is really untouched by much of the turmoil sweeping Central America, Benton said.

"The only problem they have is on their northern border, where the Contras (backers of former Nicaraguan general Somoza) are using Costa Rican land to invade Nicaragua. Since there is no army in Costa Rica they really have no way of keeping them out," she said. "The Costa Ricans are not all thrilled about having Nicaraguans there. Some people say that it is Cuban and Communist dominated, and others say no, they are just trying to work out their problems."

"The government tried to call in United Nations troops to guard the border, but they have not been successful," Benton said.

Costa Rica faces bankruptcy and has problems with paying back loans to the International Monetary Fund (IMF), she said. "They had a socialized system before, but the government went bankrupt. When I was there electricity rates shot up 500 percent. The rates were increased to pay off the IMF. Costa Ricans are more concerned with their internal rather than external problems," Benton said.

Benton went to five different cities in Nicaragua, staying with contacts she had gotten from Costa Rica. According to Benton, people are generally supportive of the government, even when they have made mistakes.

"There have been concrete changes. The literacy campaign has increased literacy by 50 percent. People cannot read Shakespeare, but they can read newspapers and write their names. This had never happened before," she said. "They have modernized the market places and put in running water. Every child in Nicaragua has been vaccinated against childhood disease."

Benton said while she was in Honduras in between coups, there were soldiers and armed plain clothes people everywhere.

"It was hard to get any information because the press is so censored, and even moderate opinions were dangerous to speak. Nobody would really talk to us about the government. Anytime we tried to start conversation they would turn away. This was in the city," she said.

"Once we started going out in the country the Indians either didn't speak Spanish or wouldn't talk to us. The few people that would talk to us would explain something that was going on, but they would not offer an opinion," she said.

Announcements

On Friday November 18 a conference on Electoral Participation and Community Activism: Black Politics in the 1980s will be held in West Lecture Hall, Franklin Peterson Hall, Hampshire College. Sessions will be held from 3-5 p.m. and 7-9 p.m.

Robert Chrisman, co-founder, publisher and editor-in-chief of the Black Scholar will speak on "Solidarity with Cuba: Implications for the Larger Movement for Social Change." The lecture will be held at 4:30 p.m., New Africa House 315. The lecture is sponsored by OTWA, AHORA, Third World Caucus, Afro-American Department and the Western Mass Venceremos Brigade. It is free and open to the public.

Corrections

"Grenadians set stage for invasion," an article published in Black Affairs on November 9, 1983, was the editorial opinion of its author, Norman Hill, president of the A. Philip Randolph Institute in New York.

Black Affairs apologizes for any inconvenience caused by its publication.

In "Puerto Rico's role in Grenada cited," published on November 16, 1983, Roosevelt's Road, a naval base in Puerto Rico was incorrectly referred to as, "Rooster's road."

Why Frye?

How can boots that look this good, this much in style, be over a hundred years old? They're Frye Boots. Benchcrafted by skilled hands the same way since 1863.

So while the styles may change the quality will remain the same. The best.

Arts

Trailers by Andy Gordon

Director John Carpenter crouches on the set of his new film Christine, adapted from the best-selling novel by Stephen King.

John Carpenter is a fantastic director, but with each tidbit I hear about Christine, his new film, the sillier it's beginning to sound. Based on a novel by Stephen King, whose got quite a track record as well, the title character is a car. To quote the film's press release, which uses the pronoun "she" about eighty times a page, "she is a vehicle possessed of evil, with the terrifying power to seduce those of her choosing and destroy anyone in her way. She is Christine, a red and white 1958 Plymouth Fury whose standard equipment includes an evil, indestructable vengeance." Keith Gordon, the young star of Dressed to Kill, stars as Arnie Cunningham, the owner of Christine, "consumed with an irrational passion for her sleek, Chrome-laden body." The coming attractions make the picture look just as foolish. Carpenter or no Carpenter, this could be The Car Part II.

Farley Mowat's best selling book, Never Cry Wolf, has been made into what has already been touted a very beautiful film. Directed by Carroll Ballard, whose first film was the beautiful The Black Stallion, the picture was shot on location in Alaska, which doubles as the vastness of the Arctic. Charles Martin Smith (Toad in American Grafitti) stars as a young biologist studying and living amongst wolves. Brian Dennehy also stars.

Fans of the sleeper comedy Valley Girl should be warned not to mistake it for a new film, Valley Girls (plural). While the former concerns the tender relationship between a young San Fernando woman and a Hollywood punker, the latter film features recently acquitted John Holmes waving his tree trunk at everything that moves. It also stars Cindy Shephards, Misty Dawn (sure), Becky Savage and Desiree Lane. The ad line reads "Like gag them with his spume." Very tasteful. Suffice it to say we couldn't run the press photos.

Local Best Bets: It's beyond me how anyone could dislike The Big Chill, a beautiful film about friendship and idealism and how time takes its toll on each. The picture is still playing at the Hampshire 4 and although it's become chic of sorts to rag on the film it is definitely worth catching. Even David "why-see-a-movie-when-you-can-catch-a-concert" Chevan would enjoy it. A highly acclaimed "small" film called The Grey Fox opens today at the Academy of Music. Roger, Gene and the Boston Phoeniz all loved it, which is good enough for me. The Amherst Cinema has The Graduate, which is timeless and without flaw, playing with the uncut version of The Ruling Class. The cut version is long and tedious, the long version must be torture.

Flicks to avoid: Nate and Hayes; This silly looking piece of clap-trap has had it's title changed about a thousand times. It was Treasure Island, then Savage Treasure, and up until maybe three weeks ago, Savage Island. A bomb by any other name would sink as fast. Amityville 3-D; This waste of celluloid wouldn't be quite so bad a shame had they not recruited the talents of Tony Roberts, Candy Clark and Tess Harper (who was wonderful as the widow in Tender Mercies). A Christmas Story; How can I dare rag on this great classic? It's a contemporary comic update, perpetrated by Bob Clark (Porky's). Blasphemy.

TRAILERS Trivia: A lot of correct answers to the last question. John Landis will direct Michael Jackson's Thriller song for national distribution. Paul Holt was the first to answer and as such received passes to Richard Pryor's new concert film, Here and Now, which is currently playing at the Mountain Farms 4. This week's question: General Hospital, in the news lately because of Laura Baldwin's return to Luke Spencer (when already?), gave time off to actor Stuart Damon to appear in a just-released film. Alan Quartermaine turns up in what film? (Note: I'm not talking about Young Doctors in Love). The first correct answer will receive an 8x10 photo of Blake Edwards biting his finger. Happy Thanksgiving.

Osterman Weekend a strong America picture

THE OSTERMAN WEEKEND
Directed by Sam Peckinpah

By JAMES TAYLOR
Collegian Correspondent

Sam Peckinpah is a director with a versatile and, in today's times, rare talent -- he knows what a camera is for and he knows how to use it.

The Osterman Weekend is Sam's 'return from exile' after seven years. He has incorporated many of the elements that had made his earlier work great.

The plot of The Osterman Weekend is based on the second novel by Robert Ludlum. John Tanner (Rutger Hauer), "a bigot for American Justice," is partially convinced by a CIA operative, Facet (John Hurt), that three of his friends are members of Omega, a Soviet spy network. Tanner and his friends meet once a year for a weekend. This time it is under surveillance by Facet.

Peckinpah introduces his own elements into the story, and successfully. The kinetic editing of the slow-motion action sequences are timed perfectly with the standard speed shots. Sam pans, zooms, and tracks at the right moment, and uses close, medium, and long shots when they should be used.

There are many events happening simultaneously in this story, and if the audience is eating too much popcorn the movie may become a bit confusing. There is no villian, and the characters are very cold in their relationships, so we can not really tell who we should trust.

There is a variety of characters, all in upper middle-class status, ranging from a fatuous doctor and his young wife "with a nose problem" (Dennis Hopper, Helen Shaver), an aggressive stockbroker and his uncultured wife (Chris Sarandon, Cassie Yates), and a liberal "neo-anarchist living on residuals" (Craig T. Nelson). Ali (Meg Foster), Tanner's wife, is the strongest character. She spends her time hunting with a compound bow and a crossbow. The Tanners are the stereotypical American family: husband, wife, boy, and dog.

All of Peckinpah's films revolve around the "constriction of the modern world and contemporary man's paranoid retreat from instinct." This is the theme of The Osterman Weekend.

Peckinpah's action sequences are, as always, exhilarating. He is the best action director of his time, and if he continued filmmaking (as I wish he would), he would remain the best. Peckinpah once said, 'Action, if it's to work, must be rooted ruthlessly in character.'

This is a strong American motion picture, and if you have not seen it in a cinema, then you may be lucky enough to catch it on cable or video cassette.

Soccer faces North Carolina could face UConn in final

By ELLEN RICHARD
Collegian Staff

Two months and 16 games ago, Kalkeni Banda, coach of the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team, had small hopes of UMass competing in the NCAA Tournament, never mind the Final Four.

"I think we're going to be competitive but we're not going to be great," coach Banda said at the end of August. "There are better teams and we have a tougher schedule. Everyone has improved more than us, although we're still good."

Who would have thought back then that the young Minutewomen team, consisting of 11 freshmen and sophomores and five upperclassmen would be going to the Final Four this weekend in Florida? Not Banda.

"I'm not going to beat around the bush," he said before leaving for Florida. "When we first came here in pre-season I said, 'Holy mackerel, we're in trouble.' If you had asked me then if we'd make the final four, I would be lying to you.

"We took a chance and changed our system dramatically. I knew we were not going to be an explosive team."

Against North Carolina (16-1) on Saturday, the Minutewomen will stick with the style that has made what could have been a mediocre team into a National contender. Defense has been the key to all victories.

The Minutewomen defense of Mary Szetela, Beth Semonik, Kristi Kelly and Deanna Denault have been the aggressive wall in front of the UMass goal. Two time All-American Lori Stukes combines tough defense and leadership, and has scored four goals this season for UMass. Freshman Michelle Rodney has played well when called upon.

"Our playing defense was the only way to gain respect around the region," Banda said. "We save our energy and put in more on defense and hope there's mistakes. That's how we survive; there's no other formula."

The Minutewomen will have to play their game and keep their heads against two-time defending National Champion North Carolina. The Tar Heels have an explosive forward line and precise passing. Player for player on paper North Carolina, whose sole loss was to UConn, is the better team - but UM is prepared and has the winning formula.

"We're looking for team play," Banda said. "Playing defensive soccer is the number one priority. They're going to try and come on us hard and I'm hoping to slow them down and force mistakes. It's a matter of containing our emotions. We can't afford to be frustrated. We have to stand the frustration longer and play a better game and make them frustrated."

The Tar Heels do have one weakness amongst their talent and it lies at fullback. The backfield is not as strong as it should be and UMass will be aiming to apply the most pressure there.

"It will be our defense versus their offense," Banda said in reviewing the situation. "They're similar to George Mason, who UMass beat 2-1, in terms of speed up front. Talent wise, similar to UConn. They have well-skilled players, they're explosive, a scholarship team, their bench is stronger than ours, and besides that they're National Champions two years in a row. They have very few weaknesses. In other words, we've got our hands full."

The Minutewomen do have another thing going for them since they have played at the University of Central Florida before and it should be an advantage, psychologically.

"It's magic. It's a dream," Banda said. "These girls have worked hard and you've got to give them credit. We're just going to go out there and play as if we're playing our final game and this is it. We'll let the game take care of itself."

If UMass tops North Carolina, they will take on either top ranked Connecticut or unseeded George Mason on Sunday afternoon. Jeanne Paul, who has a 6-0-1 record, is slated to start in goal against UNC.

Field hockey goes for it; faces Old Dominion

By JILL LANG
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts field hockey team is in Philadelphia this weekend, at the University of Pennsylvania for the NCAA championships. Tonight, at 7:30 the Minutewomen seeded third will play second seeded Old Dominion in the semi-finals of the tourmanment. Depending upon the outcome of that game, UMass will either move onto the finals, or play in a consolation match, both on Sunday.

This is the most important weekend of the season.

Yet, in an interview Wednesday, coach Pam Hixon was laughing and smiling while she spoke about the upcoming weekend. Why isn't she nervous?

"Why should I be?" she said. "I can't be uptight now. If I was, I'd be exhausted by Friday."

But seriously, the most important thing for Hixon and her team is the game against ODU.

"Friday means everything, and Sunday means nothing right now," Hixon said. "As soon as we know what we're playing for, then we'll think about it."

The stickers played ODU earlier on the season, and lost 1-0 at Temple. Hixon said that game was not truly indicative of her team's ability, and she said she is looking forward to a more exciting game tonight.

"This will be a great contest. They (ODU) know they won't walk away from this match," Hixon said.

"We have a great mental attitude going into this weekend," Hixon said.

"We're hungry. We're not afraid to put ourselves on the line... and that's the way to play a tournament."

Looking back on the last season, when UMass lost to Iowa in the quarterfinals of the tournament, Hixon said she sees a big difference in the team's attitude.

"We lacked commitment last year. We weren't believers." she said. "This year we're confident in ourselves as a team.

"They (the team) are more willing to sacrifice themselves for the betterment of the team. They're more willing to accept new roles and ideas."

No matter what, Hixon said, "We're just gonna reach back and go for it."

Leading a balanced offensive attack is junior forward Pam Moryl with 13 goals and senior forward Sué Packard with 14 assists, many off of corners. In the back, four year starter, goalie Patty Shea is the anchor. Shea has 14 shutouts on the year and has only given up four goals. All-American Megan Donnelly and Carol Progulske lead the defense.

"If we can get past Old Dominion, we have a good chance to take it all," Hixon said. If the 15-2-2 Minutewomen overcome the Monarchs, they will face either top ranked Connecticut or Northwestern in the Championship game. UMass tied UConn 1-1 this season and defeated Northwestern. Two years ago, in the first NCAA championship, UConn topped beat top-ranked UMass 4-1.

Football trys to end frustrating season on winning note

By BILL SHEA
Collegian Staff

To most, the game means little.

Vegas won't put out a line and the Globe isn't going to hold the presses waiting for the score. The game won't decide a national playoff berth and the networks didn't wage a bidding war for the TV rights.

But when the University of Massachusetts (3-7) football team takes on the Northeastern Huskies (5-4-1) at 1 p.m. Saturday in Boston the game will have significance.

Maybe not to the oddsmakers or the newspapers or the television networks, but to seniors playing in the final game of their career, this game means a lot.

A 3-7 season is a disappointment for any player but for seniors, it hits home extra hard. The season may have been a painful and frustrating experience for the UMass seniors, but an impressive season finale could ease the pain. Tri-captains Gary Freker, Rich Jenkins and Grady Fuller will all play their last games in UMass uniforms. So will Peter Anderson, Kevin Jackson, Jim Rice, Barrett McGrath, John Shay, Craig Lesinski, Scott Rose, John Jeffries, Allan Roche, and Jim Sears.

The reason this season has been so disturbing for the Minutemen and their followers is because UMass is better than a 3-7 football team. The ten opponents UMass has faced this year have a combined record of 63-32-3 and Northeastern head coach Paul Pawlak realizes his Huskies better be ready for UMass.

"I will not be deceived by a 3-7 record," declared Pawlak, who served as an offensive coordinator at UMass under head coach Bob Pickett before taking the Northeastern job three years ago. "I know that five of those losses could have very easily been wins."

Asbestos being removed from Campus Center

University Store set for move into Student Union

By RALPH ROBERTS
Collegian Correspondent

The University Store at the University of Massachusetts will begin moving to the Cape Cod lounge and the ballroom in the Student Union next Monday.

UMass spokeswoman Ann Wood said the move is being made so asbestos can be removed from the store's Campus Center site.

Win Cummings, manager of the University Store, said the move had to be made immediately, although "it will probably cause a lot of headaches."

The move is expected to be completed by Dec. 20, and the asbestos removal will begin on Dec. 21, Cummings said.

"In this area, we can't talk from experience because we've never had to exercise a full-scale move like this before, Cummings said. "We're going to try to make the move with least disruption to the students as possible."

The University Store, which covers an area of 12,000 square feet in floor space is moving into 9,000 square feet, Cummings said.

"We're actually losing much more than the 3,000 square feet, because we won't have all the wall fixtures that we put a lot of clothes on, nor the excess storage space that comes in so handy," he said.

Paul Knight, Campus Center Board of Governors member said conference rooms will be opened evenings to make upfor the loss of study space.

"Many of the students would rather study in the smaller rooms where it's totally quiet," Knight said.

Once the asbestos is removed, the University Store must move back into the Campus Center location by Jan. 31, the beginning of spring semester.

"As soon as we get by the Christmas rush we have to begin getting ready for the spring school supply rush," Cummings said.

The University Store will "not necessarily" lose money during the move, Cummings said.

Various departments within the University Store will try to remain open during the move, and goods already in the Student Union Mini-Store, will not be moved up to the ballroom or the lounge, he said.

Cummings said there may be some with the move.

"People are used to going into the store and knowing where to find certain items," he said. "But after the move begins, people, including employees, will have trouble finding specific items."

Although the move is a new challenge for the University, Cummings said that the removal of asbestos in public buildings wasn't unusual.

The Springfield Post Office recently went through the re-position.

The removal of the University Store asbestos is part of a program to remove asbestos from the ceiling of the Campus Center Concource and Goessman Laboratory. The entire program should cost $400,000 to $600,000, according to University spokesman Arthur Clifford.

Richard Bradley, vice-president of Barnes and Jarnis, consulting on the job, said bids for the asbestos removal contract are being accepted, and the job will "definitely" be finished before students return in February.

Two more fires reported

Two bulletin board fires, one in Cashin dormitory in the Sylvan Residential Area and one in Mary Lyons dormitory in the Northeast Residential Area, caused no damage this weekend, University of Massachusetts Police reported.

Police said the Cashin fire, reported at 12:10 a.m. Sunday, involved various advertising brochures and memos on a bulletin board on the second floor's east side. No damage resulted in the dorm's seventh fire in the last month, police said.

Police also responded to a report of burning posters on the third floor of Mary Lyons dormitory at 8:45 p.m. Saturday. The fire had been extinguished by two people by the time police arrived.

The UMass Department of Environmental Health and Safety, and the Amherst Fire department also responded to the fires, police said.

Israeli fighters rocket Syrians

BEIRUT, Lebanon (AP) —Swarms of Israeli fighter-jets rocketed and strafed positions in the Syrian-held mountains east of Beirut in a retaliatory raid Sunday, and ground gunners shot down at least one of the planes.

The fighters came from over the Mediterranean, roared low over Beirut, and hurtled east starting at 2 p.m., (7 a.m. EST). They made at least a dozen runs over the capital and the mountains.

State radio said as many as 18 warplanes struck a half-dozen villages in the 45-minute attack, the third Israeli retaliatory strike this month against targets in Syrian-held parts of Lebanon.

Syria claimed two Israeli planes were downed Sunday.

There was no official word on casualties, but a statement from the Syrian-backed Druse militia said Israeli bombs killed at least two civilians and wounded eight in the Drusecontrolled town of Sofar.

In northern Lebanon, Syriansupported mutineers in the Palestine Liberation Organization shelled the followers of PLO chairman Yasser Arafat for the 17th day, hitting targets in the city of Tripoli. The loyalists returned fire, and Arafat said the rebels "will not be able to destroy me."

Beirut witnesses and state radio said Israeli Kfir fighter bombers dived in pairs from overcast skies over Lebanon's central mountains, then strafed, rocketed and bombed positions in and around half a dozen villages about nine miles east of Beirut.

Beirut radio said eight Kfirs participated in the bombing runs and F-4 and F-16 jets circled providing cover.

Reporters on the Beirut-Damascus highway, which cuts through the central mountains, said they saw at least one Syrian artillery battery fire dozens of rounds at the planes, and anti-aircraft missiles crisscrossed the sky.

Heir to British throne takes hike

LONDON (AP) — Seventeen-month-old Prince William has gone on his first royal walk-about.

London's tabloid weekly the News of the World displayed on Sunday what it said were exclusive pictures of his first steps in public.

The photos show the prince, second in line to the throne, toddling from a baby stroller on the grounds of Highgrove House, the rural home of his mum and dad, Princess Diana and Prince Charles.

"The new royal 'footman' was intrigued by a flockof birds and tried to go solo to take a closer look," the newspaper reported. "But the future king...managed about 50 yards under his own steam before taking a well-earned rest in his baby stroller."

Iowa explosion leaves 2 missing

PLEASANT HILL, Iowa (AP) — Two teen-agers last seen hunting near the site of an enormous dynamite explosion remained missing Sunday, and authorities think they may have fired shots that set off the blast felt up to 45 miles away.

The 12 ½ tons of dynamite that exploded Saturday was five times the amount used to level the U.S. Marines installation in Beirut, Lebanon, last month, officials said.

Officials were only theorizing that the blast may have been set off by gunshots and still were not sure what caused the explosion, said Polk County Sheriff's Deputy Harold Strasbourg.

But Des Moines Sgt. Frank Murray of the police department's Hazardous Device Team said bomb investigators from that department believed a shot might have been fired from the hill behind the bunker and penetrated the roof.

A gunshot wound normally would not cause such a blast, said Reynold Hentges, assistant Iowa fire marshal.

The boys were identified Sunday as Clint woodard, 14, and Jeffrey Wadell, 13, both of Des Moines.

Women's activist still has hope

NEW YORK (AP) — Last week's vote by the House of Representatives against the Equal Rights Amendment was not a setback for women's rights, Judy Goldsmith, president of the National Organization for Women, said Sunday.

"The women's movement is moving forward very energetically," Ms. Goldsmith said on the CBS News program "Face the Nation." She called Wednesday's House vote "a failure of our elected representative officials ... to implement the will of the people."

Anti-ERA activist Phyllis Schlafly, also appearing on the program, supported the House vote, saying the proposed amendment to the U.S. Constitution is unnecessary because women "do not have the ambition and drive to succeed" in the job market as men have.

"Women do have ambition and work hard," she said, "but most women choose to apply those energies to building their family."

Rep. Barbara Mikulsky, D-Md., said major institutions that "contribute the big bucks to campaigns" are fighting ERA because it would end wage, pension and insurance discrimination.

Boston man fished out of Charles

BOSTON (AP) — A 24-year-old Navy veteran was yanked from the icy Charles River by a policeman and revived by a passing news reporter after a woman spotted his empty wheelchair by the water's edge, his rescuers said.

Kenny Knowlton, a patient at the Veterans Administration Hospital in the West Roxbury section, was in satisfactory condition there Sunday, according to a hospital spokeswoman. He was being treated for hypothermia.

Metropolitan District Commission police officer Vernon Beldon was sent to the scene Friday after a woman reported she could see a wheelchair with no one in it near a boat house on the river bank, across the street from the hospital.

"I approached the area and saw the wheelchair tracks leading to the water," Beldon said. "I walked down there and saw the wheelchair at the edge of the water. Then I saw a face, only a face showing up from the water.

"I ran into the river, grabbed the man and pulled him out to the bank. I ran back to the cruiser to call for help and waved down a car pulling in. He was coming from the direction of the hospital and I thought he was a doctor."

The driver was J. Michael McGorty, a reporter for the Quincy Patriot Ledger.

"I ran down the hill and first saw the empty wheelchair and then noticed the sandy, muddy marsh — not a pretty area," McGorty said in an interview. "Then I saw the body, feet lapping in the water, and all I could think was, 'Oh, my God.'

"First I just looked at him. His eyes were open. I asked him, 'Are you hurt? Are you suffering.?'

Shelter keeps women, children from beatings

By BROOKE STATES
Collegian Staff

She had a masters in social work and had been married for eight years.

She was beaten from the day she was married.

She was a devout Catholic.

It was hard for her to get a divorce and move out.

When she did move she got a restraining order against her husband, but he was able to get her kicked out of 12 places in three years through abuse and harassment.

When she went to court for custody of her child, the court held that because the father had a permanent place to live and a steady job, while she had neither, the father should get custody.

The above scenario was "the worst case that I have dealt with, but far from untypical," Nina Ryan, a UMass student intern at the Womanshelter/Companeras said.

This Holyoke-based battered women's shelter is one of 22 that work together across the state. While offering a variety of services, their common aim is to help battered women and their children deal with the problem of abuse.

A woman is battered every 18 seconds in the country. The gamut runs from murder and sexual assault to harassment, kicks, and punches. Though the act may be isolated it is a frequently recurring and escalating problem, Ryan said.

"Womanshelther/Companeras utilizes student interns and a grass roots approach to problems. Our aim is to empower women to combat violence against them in society. We are a self-help type of shelter, offering different options as well as support and advocacy, but the women's decisions are their own." she said.

For students interested in working as interns in the shelter, there are three options.

One is the direct service internship which includes working on the shelter's 24-hour hotline, accompanying women to court, and helping women obtain housing.

The child advocacy internship is for helping children of battered mothers while the outreach intership involves publicizing work of the shelter.

"We provide training, do role plays, readings, and have a very intensive program for the interns," Karen Hakala said.

Hakala is the Student Intern volunteer coordinator for the shelter.

Womanshelter/Companeras is a member of the United Way and receives part of its funding from there and the rest through donations and their own fundraising.

Women can stay at the shelter for up to six weeks.

"We get about 75 hotline calls a month and handle 25 women and children in that time," Hakala said.

"Offering a support group is the most important thing that we do. Battering cuts across all class and age groups. When they call us up on the hotline, we try and help them figure out what options are available. Women who do not have options talk about coming into the shelter," she said.

"It has been a tremendous growth experience personally, to be part of a supportive group of women who are changing the status quo. Everytime a woman goes for a resisting order in court it makes it easier for the women who come after her," Ryan said.

UM to get grant for $5 million

The University of Massachusetts will be receiving a $5 million to $6 million grant from the state legislature and Gov. Michael S. Dukakis this morning at a press conference at the Governor's office.

A member of the UMass administration confirmed Sunday that this money is primarily directed toward the Polymer Science Department, reflecting a commitment to promoting research in this area at the University.

The money might also be used to build a new facility to take advantage of the capabilities of the department.

William MacKnight, head of the Polymer Science Department, said he would be able to better comment after the press conference.

800 protest in Belchertown

By DANIEL SOBEL
Collegian Staff

BELCHERTOWN — About 800 people gathered Sunday on Town Common for a rally opposing proposed construction on Belchertown State School grounds.

Organizers and guests spoke against the institutionalization of handicapped people, and advocated the idea of community living programs where patients move back into the community and receive help from staff and volunteers.

Organizer Carol Shelton said a bill has passed in the House and is now in the Senate. The bill would prohibit patients from leaving the institution and returning to community life.

"The whole idea behind normalization is putting people back in the community," said Gary Hartwell, a member of Services For Community Living in Holyoke.

One demonstrator said he's been in institutions, including the Belchertown School, all his life.

"People call me mentally retarded, but it takes a mentally retarded person to call someone else one," said Anthony Gibson.

He added that in every institution he's been in the treatment of patients has been terrible.

"In every institution they treat you bad," he said. "They'll beat the living 'you know what' out of you," Gibson said.

"It costs about $70,000 a year for each person now living at the Belchertown State School," the Committee In Support of Community Living said in a press release.

Bob Lipton, a member of that committee said, "We could use that money a lot more efficiently putting people back in the community."

Carol Shelton, a member of the organizing committee, said she was happy with the outcome of the rally and that the message was presented well and "we want to see what shakes out of this."

She added a possible future rally in Boston might echo their opinion and hopefully kill the bill in the Senate.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

A President they all liked

During this year's 20th Anniversary of President Kennedy's assasination, many rememberances and columns will have been written about the man for "what he might've become." This is perfectly understandable, given the fact Kennedy was such a young president.

There are those, no doubt, who believe Kennedy would've become our greatest post-WWII president. Of course, his detractors claim he wasn't so great or productive after all. Whether or not Kennedy was the shining knight or Camelot or a pre-packaged myth: I wish to leave that to professional historians.

Steven P. Barrett

What I do wish, however, is to discuss Kennedy's role as a scholar-president. We've had very few of these kind of men sitting in the White House. But the list of scholar presidents is a prestigious one indeed. Jefferson, Madison, John Q. Adams, Woodrow Wilson are a few names to mention, and Kennedy's name belongs with theirs. I'm not saying Kennedy achieved the same kind of success — and certainly no one in our nation's history will ever match Thomas Jefferson in terms of pure intellectual and political ability.

Unlike his brothers and father, Jack Kennedy was the "intellectual" of his family. The other men were pure politicians. Jack was the only true scholar in the family. Yes, I've read reports saying he didn't really write all of While England Slept and Profiles in Courage; but instead Kennedy used classified documents for the former and used ghost writers for the latter. How true these reports are, can only be left to speculation. It's easy to knock a dead writer. Rather than quibbling over the sources he used — perhaps we should pay more attention to the message he tried to give us — particularly about the dangers of unilateral disarmament and appeasement strategies when dealing with totalitarian regimes.

Whether for good or bad, Jack Kennedy's real desire to be a scholar-president (and a scholar first) manifested itself through his choice of confidants and cabinet-level appointees. Don't get me wrong; after all, Jack Kennedy was a superb politician as well.

Yet, because of his untimely death, followed by the murders of his brother, Robert, and Martin Luther King only five years later — the nation's youth eventually became the ultimate victims in terms of a loss of intellectual spirit which a nation as vast, heterogeneous and great as our's could not afford to lose.

Adding to the deaths of the Kennedy brothers and Martin Luther King, my generation endured and fought through the Vietnam War, and became disillusioned because of Watergate, and the CIA hearings shortly after Watergate and the Vietnam War were over. (I will always refer to this period during the mid-seventies as liberalism's and Frank Church's revenge for McCarthyism.)

On top of these setbacks, we had the oil embargoes, rapid inflation, urban unrest, declining social values, (abortion became legal and the rising divorce rate) and what also became commonly referred to during the end of the Carter years, "malaise of spirit." But the ultimate insult came in the form of the Iranian hostage seizure, and botched rescue mission.

Aside from the more well known setbacks we've endured during the last twenty years, there's another illness which has plagued us; the complacency of our youth with regard to learning about our historical and political heritage. What are the teachers telling our students nowadays when a professor volunteered to inform high schoolers one night a few years back at a local high school's "candidate night" about his candidate for president — only to find out he had to teach them about the basics of our political and electoral systems instead? What did their teachers ever bother to tell them before?

When Jack Kennedy marshalled the youth to reach for the stars, he didn't have to worry about whether Johnny could read or not. But today's leaders must worry about whether we have a literate generation to count on in times of need.

Twenty years ago we set our sights on the moon. Nowadays we have to set our sights back on the blackboards — no, not computer screens — in order to remedy twenty years of relative neglect.

Doesn't it strike you oddly when you pick up the paper and read about people who don't even know who their congressman or senators are? The voting age was lowered, the drinking age was lowered, access to a college education was made easier, and the standards in some cases were lowered to accompany those who were trying to overcome years of discrimination. Mediocrity was inevitable.

Here's a fitting memorial for Kennedy, and a challenge for students if it's followed. To paraphrase Kennedy's famous "Ask not what your Country can..." I say, ask not what our colleges and universities can do for you, but what we can all do to revive our heritage of intellectual challenge and civic responsibility.

We not only owe this as a lasting tribute for President Kennedy, but more importantly, to our future generations.

Nuclear madness—a desperate time

If, this Sunday evening, you felt like watching something mindless and entertaining, did not turn to The Day After. For those who did watch, it did not pacify you. It may have turned your lounge chair into a timebomb, and evoked feeling you invest a great deal of energy in repressing. It mirrors a hideous nightmare which you don't acknowledge living in fear of.

Jessica Barmack

On the other hand, if the powerlessness you feel in facing the future is eating into you, then perhaps it is time to confront the nightmare.

The Day After may be your future. Can you bare to see it? It is absolutely realistic. Do you ever think about it? Can you truly say that the threat of a nuclear holocaust does not influence you? Do you believe unequivocally in your continuance? Because if you do you're kidding yourself.

The nuclear dilemma should, logically, be the greatest motivation for action. Why is it not? Because all the energy that should be put into expressive action is being put into denial of the problem's existence.

You do have power. Find out about it. You can vote, write your political representatives, participate in rallies...

Do face reality. Painful though it is, it is also freeing. Realize that it is the few who are happy to have our energy harnessed in self-delusion so that they can manipulate the future which is rightfully all of ours.

Quentin deserves better

To the Editor,

As the author of the comic strip "Quentin," I was indeed surprised, or rather dismayed, to find on the editorial page of Nov. 17 a "Quentin" I had never seen before. This is to apologize for the "Quentin," which was in my judgement patently offensive, and ought not to have been printed.

There are three reasons that this strip should not have appeared in the Collegian.

First, I don't approve of the use of comic strips for toe-stepping and editorializing. Too much of that has been done in the past, and I have deliberately avoided that kind of content in "Quentin."

Second, I don't endorse the viewpoint expressed in the cartoon. The personal attack on the SGA co-president Charlene Allen was unwarrented, and I have personally apologized to her for it.

Third, the strip was published without my consent, or even my knowledge! I, like thousands of other readers, first learned of it when I flipped through the newsaper Thursday afternoon.

Further, I resent being put in a position where I have to apologize for someone else's actions. The strip was not mine, yet I'm the one saying I'm sorry.

Collegian Associate Women's Issues Editor Rita Murphy is responsible for the strip, and from her there should be an apology forthcoming, as well as from whoever is responsible for the decision to print the strip.

The integrity of "Quentin" should not be jeapordized by the irresponsible mud-slinging of others.

Mark MacKenzie
Northeast

Editor's note: The Collegian apologizes to Mr. MacKenzie for not notifying him of the publication of the "Fill-in-your-own" Quentin before hand.

The editorial content of the cartoon does not reflect the opinion of any or all Collegian Editors. It is, like anything else on the "Ed/Op" page, the opinion of its author.

Random Notes — On Protest

by Walter Mecham

When passing the White Hous during our search for the rally again t U.S. militarism abroad, we saw a stream of complacent tourists slowly flowing into the Reaganless White House. Seeing no radicals or protestors, we marched pass this thin ring of symbolically supportive citizens apparently concerned with what Nancy has done with the White House and chanted, "War! No More! U.S. out of El Salvador!... We received curious stares and blank faces. Little did we know that within two hours there would be tens of thousands marching along with us, the block completely encircled with upset American liberals and angry but eager radicals, two lanes of traffic thick.

Unfortunately, world-wide reactions to the march and rally in Washington D.C. on Saturday, March 12, 1983 will probably be similar to the reactions we received when passing the White House tourists and fall far short of the ideals and aspirations of the protestors and speakers we listened to.

The rally lacked the air of anger and militancy that some people believed to be the only effective demonstration. The crowd generally believed that non-violence was the best way to convey the message, establish moral superiority, and thus express desire for change from militant policy — a change towards tolerance, civility, and proper communication. The hope is that people in America will fully realize that the stance our federal government takes means deaths, now and in the future. Russians and Americans are not enemies. Our governments are enemies.

U.S. federal policy should be seen as the continuity of American expansionism and racism. The calling is for an end to U.S. imperialism, the extraction of U.S. troops in Central America, and even the impeachment of President Reagan ("the old fascist") for lying to the American people, illegally invading Grenada, and denying the press its freedom as guaranteed by the First Ammendment. The calling is for drastic changes in ethics and strategy, a return to sovereignty and a turnabout from fascism.

The aspiration is a difficult one to attain, the lines drawn are difficult to erase, and trust difficult to establish. A departure from the ideology which justifies the resurgence of military action is needed, and assessments of social realities, existing contradictions and the possibilities for their resolvement, need to be discussed world-wide. America stands in a position of strength. It is the strong who must lay down their arms if peace is to be attained. Let us be the quiet giant. Let us speak and act from wisdom, rather than from strained ideologue.

The unity of the superpowers, in recognition of their similar goal to unify the people of the world, is needed. Extensive communication, tolerance of the free development of independent nations, social cooperation and peaceful trade replacing military aid; all these things are called for, and necessary. The time has come.

B-52's party out of bounds

B-52's
Thursday, November 17
Fine Arts Center

By MARY CRESSE
Collegian Staff

Whenever I'd venture to punk parts unknown, my mother — in true motherly fashion — would always question the credibility and safety of my plans, just short of asking for the birth dates of the participants:

"And just exactly what are you doing, tonight?" she'd thunder.

"Dis-gus-ting things you'd never anticipate," I'd half-sing and walk out.

Cryptic? She thought so. But she doesn't listen to the B-52's.

The line is from the B-52's '81 hit "Party Out of Bounds" and the phrase is an almost exact description of their Thursday night dance party at the Fine Arts Center.

It wasn't the band's performance; tapes backed a couple of songs, there was a hidden bass player backstage, and singer Cindy Wilson looked a little tired, but after "Song For A Future Generation," the enthusiasm of the crowd somehow wafted to the stage, and the B-52's picked up. And stayed that way.

In short, Kate still screams with the intensity of one being stabbed to death, Cindy still imitates fish sounds as well as any sub-amphibian, and Fred, Ricky, and Keith bopped around the stage in a burst of new wave androgny not before seen at the FAC.

"Strobe Light" picked the crowd off the floor once and never let them down. Fred pulled out a fake blue phone, the strobe lights went on, Ricky whooped and danced while the strobe lights flashed. All in all it was fairly wild, and left the audience only with a feeling of anxiety that the rest of the concert would be just as good. It was.

"Planet Claire" followed, and put to rest the suspicion that "they never play the old stuff." Some groups play their old material in the style of their newer albums and fans with a memory don't like to hear it all unless it's played right. No disappointment here.

The newer, David-Byrne sound followed for "Mesopotamia," next. This gave Fred the chance to erupt into a frenzy of hieroglyphic-like quasi-Egyptian dance music which complemented the song. And we all know it's supposed to be the other way around.

"Queen of Las Vegas," a new one, in which Kate and Cindy performed the classic 52's bent-arm dancing — previewed the well-received "Wammy Kiss," but it was "Dance This Mess Around" that came second only to "Rock Lobster" as the night's favorite frug attraction. When Cindy rolled out a slow guttural "roll it ovah in your mahnd," there were a few guys in the audience who could have benefited from a cold shower.

"Rock Lobster" then, needed no intro other than the first three notes and the audience was on top of each other in order to try to capture the aura of nostalgia and everything else the song provokes when played.

Encores were expected at this point, and "Party Out Of Bounds," and another new one — this is the "Whammy" tour, you know — "Big Bird" came out, but the second encore finished with an oldie — "There's a Moon in the Sky."

FIRST MEETING: 11/28

Equaling his #1 fiction best sellers in suspense—a real-life mission impossible carried out by authentic American heroes.

They were all computer executives, employees of Ross Perot's Dallas-based EDS Corporation. They were trained and led by former Green Beret Colonel Bull Simons—the man John Wayne once told: "You are the man I play in the movies." Their secret mission: to do what the U.S. Government couldn't do. To rescue, against staggering odds, two EDS colleagues locked up in an Iranian prison in 1978.

This is the stuff of Ken Follett's #1 fiction best sellers—undercover infiltration into hostile terrain, a hairbreadth escape from a powerful enemy, a harrowing overland race past armed patrols and marauding tribesmen for the safety of the border. But this time, it's real—it actually happened.

Filled with suspense, ON WINGS OF EAGLES will fill you with pride as you share an extraordinary adventure with some authentic American heroes.

"As exciting as any of Follett's thrillers."
"An impressive nonfiction debut."

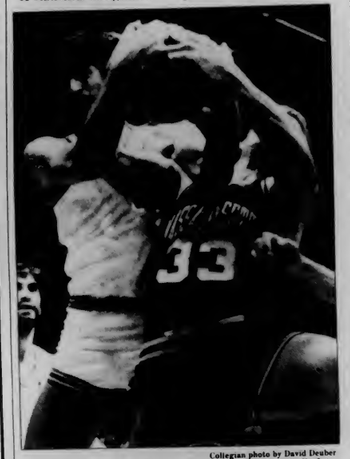
Some suggest the University of Massachusetts' 82-76 win over Zadar (Yugoslavia) Saturday night in the Curry Hicks Cage was merely an exhibition game, its significance not deserving of statistical recognition.

Regardless of whether the win counts on their record or the statistics are included in the season totals, first year Coach Ron Gerlufsen and his team passed the test against a good, not to mention big Yugoslavian team.

"We treated it like a real game," said Gerlufsen. "But I was really surprised by the size of the crowd considering we didn't really publicize the game."

Nearly 3000 fans saw the Minutemen start slowly, falling behind by as many as 15 points in the first half, before Donald Russell and John Hempel iced the second half comeback win from the foul line.

UMass shot poorly in the first half mostly due to poor shot selection, while the Yugoslavians, led by let lefty jump shooter Branko Skroce (27 points) broke to a 29-21 lead with 8:25 left in the half and pushed that lead to 41-26 with 4:25 left. The Minutemen closed the gap to 48-38 at the half.



The UMass offense struggled in the first half, especially Hempel, who finally got on track in the second half. The 6'7" sophomore scored 28 points (9 for 24 shooting, 10 of 12 from line) and grabbed a career high 17 rebounds.

"I thought John rebounded extremely well against taller people," said Gerlufsen. "Offensively we talked about getting better shots out of our offense."

Hempel began to heat up as he and Edwin Green (15 points, 10 rebounds) hit jump shots while Donald Russell handled things from the foul line. Russell shot 12 for 14 from the line and had several key free throws down the stretch.

UMass turned the ball over eight times. Russell and Craig Smith did not turn the ball over the entire game and Carl Smith's three turnovers were the only mistakes attributed to the backcourt.

UMass scored the first eight points of the second half to close the gap to 48-46 and Zadar began to miss the 15 foot jump shots they were making in the first half. The Minutemen spread the offense and Russell and Hempel made key free throws in the last five minutes before Green capped the win off with a reverse slam at the buzzer.

tercepted a UMass pass and ran 30 yards for the touchdown. Barnett McGrath and Jim Simeone were combined 4 for 19 and 86 yards on the day.

Northeastern jumped out to a 10-0 lead on a 12 yard run by Mark Curtain and a 48 yard field goal by Geoff Hart. Senior tri-captain Rich Jenkins (3 carries 49 yards) pulled UMass with three points with a 24 yard touchdown run.

After NU pushed the lead up to 10 points again, Barnwell scampered 27 yards for a touchdown but the late turnovers sealed the defeat for UMass.

The loss gives UMass a 3-7 record for the year, the worst record since the 1968 Minutemen went 2-8.

Hockey, soccer finish third in nation

Hockey loses 3-2 in semifinal to Old Dominion

By GERRY deSIMAS
Collegian Staff

PHILADELPHIA — The University of Massachusetts field hockey team had to overcome a lot this weekend. First, the Minutewomen lost a 3-2 overtime thriller to Old Dominion despite Megan Donnelly's tying goal with 10 seconds left in the regulation period. Then, they had to fight the let down of playing in the consolation game.

Patricia Shea overcame too. After suffering a possible fractured forearm against ODU, the senior goalie lead UM to a third place finish as the Minutewomen overcame Northwestern 2-1 on penalty strokes Sunday at the NCAA Championships at Franklin Field.

Shea, who was named to the Coaches All-American Team and made the All-Tournament Team, kept UMass in the consolation game as the UMass offense sputtered in the first half and into the second. With six minutes left, the Minutewomen broke loose and unleashed their offensive barrage.

"We were very flat as the game first started," UMass Coach Pam Hixon said. "Consolation games are hard to play. We were disappointed after losing a tough game to ODU."

Donnelly, who was also selected to the All-Tournament Team, along with Pam Moryl, tied the game at 29:21 off a Sue Packard corner and the game went into overtime where the UMass domination continued. Northwestern finally broke out with two minutes to go in the overtime and fired six straight corners at Shea and the UMass defense. UM stopped them and the game went into stroke-offs...

The game was tied after the first stroke-off and both Moryl and Northwestern super-scorer Lisa Griswold scored in the second stroke-off so it was even when Patti Smith scored the game winner.

Shea said that she was not tense during the stroke-offs though she dove several times on her sore arm and ran the show in the net.

Against ODU, the defending National Champions controlled the midfield and, by doing so, offensively dominated the game.

SLAPSTICK — Sue Packard fights for posession of the ball. UMass was defeated by ODU 3-2 in O.T. but came back to win over Northwestern 2-1.

UM, which was outshot 22-3 by ODU, took the early lead in the semifinal game as Moryl drove the length of the field and snuck the ball past goalie Lynn Currie at 19:15 of the first half.

"We scored almost too early," Hixon said. "It seemed like we didn't know what to do with the ball. We were almost desperate when we should have been in the driver's seat."

ODU stopped UM passes and kept the pressure on but the UM backfield of Carol Progulske, Lil Hultin, Andrea Muccini and Nancy Goode kept ODU scoreless.

Goode was a key as she marked ODU high scorer Christy Morgan throughout the first half. However, with less than two minutes gone in the second half, Goode was struck in the head with the ball and had to leave the game.

And Morgan let loose. The junior All-American tied the score at 19:25 and assisted on a Jennifer Walsh goal as ODU took the 2-1 lead.

However, ODU did not let up and when Shea sat on a ball it resulted in a penalty shot for Dawn Hill with 5:38 remaining. Hill scored and ODU went on to win.

"Massachusetts was never out of it," ODU Coach Beth Anders said. "It was a battle. Their defense was solid. I thought that break through would take a lot and it did."

Old Dominion came out as the National Champions on Sunday when it defeated the University of Connecticut 3-1 in triple overtime.

As injuries haunt, UM losesto N.C. in semifinal play

By ELLEN RICHARD

ORLANDO — After struggling, but winning, through the season with injuries, almost no bench and little scoring power, the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team saw the dream of reaching the Final Four almost turn into a nightmare when three more injuries hampered the team's prize defense resulting in a 2-1 loss to defending Champion North Carolina on Saturday.

The Minutewomen are known and respected for their never-say-die toughness and comeback ability and proved it in Sunday's 1-0 consolation win over the University of Connecticut which gave the team a third-place finish nationally. The underdog team also came back as Northeast Champs.

Leaving UMass Thursday night on the way to Florida, the team was confident in its ability. However, on Friday the Minutewomen's best defender, Lori Stukes, sprained her knee and would sit out the remaining games.

If that was not enough, defenders Michelle Rodney and Deanna Denault hurt their ankles in action on Saturday as the UMass defense began to get very small.

Only three defenders remained and Denault and Rodney hobbled about the field for their team. Rodney played so well in the effort that she received a game ball, along with UMass goaltender Jeanne Paul.

UMass held its ground defensively in the first half of the semifinal match against NC and Paul played outstanding guarding the net. But it would not last long as the wear and tear of a non-stop NC team with a large bench broke through the thin layer of UM defense.

April Heinrichs snuck past the defense and went in on Paul alone, scoring 7:42 into the second half. The goal put UMass back a step as it lost the sharpness it was playing with in the first half.

Amy Machin scored an insurance goal with 5:27 left in the game on a head shot which hit the left post and bounced past a helpless Paul. The UM goalie made 11 saves to NC goalie Beth Huber's one as the Tar Heels outshot UMass 16-3.

"For her being a freshman she played the best game I could have expected out of her," UM Coach Kalekeni Banda said of Paul, who was undefeated before this game.

UConn, which was undefeated before the playoffs, defeated UMass 1-0 earlier in the season. The game started out evenly until at 12:20 of the second, Nadia Komarowski took a pass from Debbie Haracklewicz and, beating the defense, forced the goalie out and slid the shot into the right corner.

After light rain all morning, hurricane-like wind and rain forced the ball out of bounds many times with minutes to go. In one instance Paul caught a UConn shot which slipped through her hands and into the net, but UConn had been called offside before the shot. The final game between George Mason and NC was postponed until this morning.

Spikers sweep Indians, become ECAC champs

By ED CUNNINGHAM
Collegian Staff

Storybooks endings are not always fictional. Occasionally, a real life script has just as good an ending...if not better. Just ask the University of Massachusetts volleyball team, correct that — champions.

The topseeded spikers traveled to Springfield this weekend, to compete in the ECAC tournament and lived up to their billing.

UMass faced Northeastern University in its first match and was looking to avenge a late season loss to the Lady Huskies. The match went all five games of the three out of five series. UMass won the first two games, only to see N.U. fight back and take games three and four. In the decisive fifth game, UMass pulled all the stops and would not be denied. The spikers fought hard for their 15-11 victory and birth into the ECAC finals.

"That match was incredible, it was tough to see either team lose in that match," UMass Coach Elaine Sortino said.

The other contest pitting C.W. Post against Springfield College was played to the five game limit as well. In that match-up, Springfield came away victorious and the stage was set for a UMass vs. Springfield grand finale.

UMass was about to face its biggest challenge of the year. There was no turning back; they had to produce. The young team responded admirably. The performance lead Sortino to call it "a beautiful volleyball match, and the greatest night of our volleyball program."

The key to the three game sweep (15-7, 15-2, 15-10) by the Minutewomen was their team play. Individual names could be given but there is not enough room to give the whole team and coaching staff justice.

The young team played hard all season and on this weekend. Everyone was playing well, everything fell into place and they "brought home the bacon," according to Sortino.

There are no more scheduled matches or meetings for the champs or their followers. Anyone interested however, can visit the ECAC championship trophy in Sortino's office anytime, just don't try and take away her newest piece of furniture.

Football loses to N.U., 31-14

By BILL SHEA

The 1983 University of Massachusetts season started in disappointing fashion with a 45-13 loss to Toledo and a 17-0 loss to Holy Cross, and Saturday it ended in equally disappointing fashion when the Huskies of Northeastern handed the Minutemen a 31-14 loss before 4200 at Northeastern.

As the case has been the entire year the Minutemen were victims of turnovers as Northeastern turned UMass turnovers into fourth quarter touchdowns.

With the score 17-14 Northeastern, UMass tailback George Barnwell (22 yards, 114 yards) fumbled on the Northeastern 25 yardline. The Huskies drove 75 yards for the touchdown an 11 yard run by Gary Benoit.

Then, NU's Shawn O'Malley closed the door on the UMass season when he in-

Due to conflicting reports about what Jesse Jackson said at the Nov. 12 rally in Washington and the outrage of many people at the reporters' analysis, Nummo News has agreed to print portions of Jackson's Presidential Annoucement to achieve a more balanced coverage.

...We are here to heed the call of this nation's highest and noblest principles that we might fulfill our mission to defend the poor, make welcome the outcast, deliver the needy, and be the source of hope for people yearning to be free everywhere.

...we are here that we might fulfill the promise of democracy and assure equal protection under the law and equal regard within the law for all...that we might elevate the lot of common humanity and build a functional new rainbow coalition spanning lines of color, sex, age, religion, race, region and national origin; that we might set a new moral tone and usher in a reconciling and redemptive spirit.

...I offer myself to the American people, not as a perfect servant, but as a public servant. I offer myself and my service as a vehicle to give a voice to the voiceless, representation to the unrepresented and hope to the downtrodden.

As I look out over the landscape of America and see 10 million able-bodied men and women who are actively seeking employment but unable to find jobs -- as I read with sorrow about the record number of foreclosures on homes and farms because people who have worked all their lives are unable to make the mortgage notes -- as I behold families sleeping in automobiles and under bridges and standing humbly and shamefully in cheese lines because they have no food in the wealthiest nation on earth -- as I witness 3 million additional people added to the welfare rolls --as I see schools being closed and jails being built, teachers being fired and jailers being hired -- as I watch our national tax code become increasingly regressive, unfair, and full of wasteful, unjustifiable subsidies for big corporations and wealthy individuals -- as I watch the leaders of the nation's largest corporations use windfall tax breaks for foreign investment, conglomerate mergers, acquisitions, and other fast buck schemes which add nothing to our national levels of employment, productivity, or output -- as I witness students cry because educational opportunity grants and loans are no longer available to enable them to attend college -- as I watch the distress of the senior citizens who are terrified because they fear their Social Security benefits will be taken from them -- as I watch our government join forces with undemocratic, oppressive regimes in South Africa, the Philippines, and El Salvador and see our flag burned by nations because we are thought to be a contradiction of the freedom we proclaim -- as I watch American soldiers die needlessly on foreign battlefields in undeclared wars without clear missions -- as I observe our unfair immigration policies and watch our Mexican neighbors being met at our borders by armed guards and Haitian refugees licked up in concentration camps while

Chaka and Pieces Make a A "Dream" Come True

"They were supposed to be the warm-up group but instead they stole the show," was the feeling of most spectators after "Pieces of A Dream," a group of young musicians from Philadelphia, opened for the UPC-Duke Ellington Committee production of Chaka Khan on Saturday, Nov. 19. "Pieces," which is produced by renowned jazz and contemporary saxaphonist, Grover Washington Jr., put on an excellent display of diversity and talent as they explored the realms of contemeporary Black music.

The group consists of four young men with an abundance of musical and creative talent. Bass, electric bass and lead vocals were handled beautifully by 21 yr. old Libra, Cedric Napoleon. On the drums was a 21 yr. old Scorpio, Curtis Harmon. James Lloyd, a 19 yr. old Virgo, gave an amazing performance on keyboard, synthesizer, and grand piano. The newest member of the group, 20 yr. old Randy Bowland, added new dimension to the "Pieces" sound on lead guitar.

Chaka Khan seemed to be more in the mood for jazz than her popular hits. While she rhapsodized a few jazz songs beautifully, she forgot some of the words to a few of her own hits.

Electrifying as always, Chaka wiggled across stage and at one point was helped down into the front row to charm a few of the young men up close.

While at the show, people danced and screamed and sang along with her, but expressed some disappointment after the show. Valerie Singleton, a UMass Legal Studies junior said, "I was more impressed with "Pieces of A Dream"(the opening act of the concert); they're really talented." This statement echoed the sentiments of much of Saturday night's audience.

After weeks of buying tickets and clothes, of planning and preparation, the concert-goers were disappointed with a show that was too short and in which the vocalist was often practically inaudible.

The length of the show can be blamed on the group's touring schedule, while the poor acoustics must be attributed to the Fine Arts Center where bands always seem to drown out their vocalists.

But with Chaka's strong vocal abilities, and equally strong personality, her presence was definitely heard, felt and seen, from the moment she stepped out on stage in a red, hugging top, with a V-style back and black leather loin strips, and red leather boots.

Although people grumbled later about the price of the tickets, everyone thoroughly enjoyed Chaka Khan's bluesy interjections, jazz annotations, and interplay with the band. Though Chaka will always be Chaka, she is also reminiscent of Tina Turner.

They opened the show with a couple of jazz numbers, one mellow the other up-beat. Cedric Napoleon sang a love ballad from "Pieces" upcoming album, then the group moved into a few up-beat R&B instrumentals that brought many people to their feet. James Lloyd even used his synthesizer to "scratch" which made the beboppers in the audience very happy.

"Pieces" closed with up-tempo jazz numbers and solos from each band member. With particularly strong performances from bass and keyboards "Pieces of A Dream" proved in the opinion of this reviewer, to be one of the most talented and diversified groups in the music industry today. Although the strongest emphasis is on jazz, "Pieces" crosses over the lines of contemporary music "labels", i.e. Rhythm and Blues, Funk, etc., that too many of us restrict ourselves to.

In a back stage interview after the show we found that the members of "Pieces" are not only talented but very friendly and easy going. The group, which celebrated their eighth anniversary in October, feels that the manager they've had since jr. high school, along with Philadelphia's great jazz heritage and current musicians have been the groups's strongest influence. "We try to be very versatile," said Napoleon, "we play in front of groups such as The Duke Ellington Orchestra and people such as Chaka or Rick James."

This is the second time "Pieces" has appeared in the Valley, and if it was up to this reviewer it would not be the last.

On Tuesday, Nov. 15, Boston held the final elections for mayor. Eighteen students from UMass went to Boston that day to support the campaign for Mel King. As most people know, Mel King lost the election by a considerable margin. However, the effect that his campaign had on the Boston political arena was far greater than many people realize.

The Office of Third World Affairs (OTWA) and the Third World Caucus of the Student Senate provided vans on three separate occassions during the course of the King campaign. Students went to Boston to vote, campaign, and do any thing that they could to help Mr. King. Many of the students were not even from the Boston area but they felt that it was important to support the campaign. Special thanks is given to all those students who participated in the effort.

I traveled to Boston with the feeling that I could contribute to a very vital, historical event that was taking place. To me the thought of a Black mayor in Boston was electrifying. It took a little while for the thought to sink in though.

A Black mayor in Boston, Mass.? The city where racial violence is as common now as it was 25 years ago? OK,wait a minute; a Black mayor in a city where a Black businessman was attacked with an American flag (KKK style) on the steps of city hall??? You mean the city that has a major investigation (which never gets past that stage) every few months because of white cops shooting Black youth? Kevin H. White's city? No way! A Black man could never win in that city. I'm from Boston myself. I've seen race riots in my high school, I've been chased out of Charlestown, and I've been called "nigger" too many times in Boston.

In spite of all this, I knew that I had to do my part in helping Mel. After all Mel had been helping Boston for so many years. He was even good friends witth my parents, and he was a good man. So I went to Boston four times during the course of the campaign.

The first time I went was when Jesse Jackson and Dick Gregory spoke in Boston in support of Mel King. Jackson and Gregory were very dynamic and the crowd was very large and enthusiastic. But Mel started talking about this "Rainbow Coalition" and about bringing Boston together. And I thought that maybe he might have a slight chance. His support extended beyond the Black community and even though Boston's only so-called Black newspaper, The Banner, did not support King, he was still holding his own.

Mr. and Mrs. Mel King.

The next time I went down was for the primaries. We went door to door encouraging people to vote. It was cold but we hung in there. We decided to go to the Park Plaza Hotel to Mel's reception. It was there that I saw the most amazing thing I've ever seen in Boston. Over 2,000 people of every size, age and color, all together in the same place for the same thing: Mel King.

Then when it was announced the Mel won the primaries and was going on th the finals. I thought, 'He can win! A Black mayor in Boston!' And I went outside the hotel and rallied and danced with all these people from different backgrounds. Black and white, young and old, together, and there were no fights, and no pick pockets, or purse snatching. If you are from Boston you know how unusual that is.

Even though Mel lost the vote, his reception at the Sheraton Hotel had a clear sense of victory. As Mel put it, "Both Ray Flynn and I are winners today." For over 10 minutes the audience cheered and chanted, "Mel King, Rainbow!" And although Mel only received 34 per cent of the vote, he created a sense of change in Boston.

Ray Flynn, the Mayor-elect, is supposed to be very liberal although if you look at his political record you'd never know it. Flynn knows that he must represent the people of Boston fairly. Boston will no longer allow its politicians to run racist, big-business oriented government. Because, Mel showed the people of Boston that they can make the difference.

our Canadian neighbors and refugees from Poland and the Soviet Union are greeted with open arms and resettlement assistance -- as I witness astronomical increases in poverty, unemployment, and preventable disease on Indian reservations and witness the reckless use of the powers of our government to usurp land and other national resources that rightfully belong to Native Americans -- as I witness increasing discrimination against people because of their sexual preferences -- and as I watch our Department of Justice refuse to enforce civil rights laws, aggressively oppose civil rights laws and lead the effort to dismantle federal civil rights enforcement machinery, it is clear to me that if America stands before the mirror of justice it must answer Ronald Reagan's question "Are you better off today than you were four years ago?" with a resounding "NO!"

Thus, I seek the Presidency to serve the nation at a level where I can help restore a moral tone, a redemptive spirit and a sensitivity to the poor and dispossessed of this nation.

I seek the Presidency because I want to affirm my belief that leadership is colorless and genderless, and that the sole hallmark of a true leader is not the skin color he or she received from God, but the ability of the person to bring competence, compassion and fairness to the sacred trust that the people elect their officials to discharge.

I seek the Presidency because I am disturbed that the future of our nation is in jeopardy when nearly half of our citizens who are eligible to vote are so disenchanted with years of promise without performance that they think voting is worthless.

...I am firmly convinced that there must be a new litmus test for measuring the nation's greatness. Our nation's greatness must be measured by our ideals and plans, and how closely we approximate them.

...In the days ahead, I will supply detailed positions on the varied issues we feel are important in this election. Today, I want to focus on the basic themes of my campaign and provide an outline of the new course for renewal and revival of our nation.

My candidacy will be a quest for a just society and peaceful world. Domestically, we must replace Reaganomics and new federalism with new legislative enactments and strategies in the areas of demand-oriented and training policies, tax reform, trade policy, immigration, civil rights enforcement, military and foreign policy, and health education and welfare policies.

We must recognize, as did Dr. King, that we need to develop a world house. Likewise, we must appreciate that the world has become a global village where military resources alone will not supply peace. Accordingly, my foreign policy proposals will seek to emphasize negotiations over confrontation, gunboat and big stick diplomacy, military adventurism and racial insensitivity; and will seek to measure human rights for all human beings by one yard stick. We can no longer continue to send mixed signals in the world. We can no longer define democracy as majority rule in America and minority rule in South Africa. We cannot condemn the invasion and occupation of foreign lands by the Soviet Union and engage in the same actions ourselves. Our foreign policy must make it clear that America, regardless of the practices of other nations, will participate in international affairs with one set of rules.

...We will choose the democratic forces over the aristocratic forces, and will seek Third world economic and democratic political development through persuasion rather than invasion, imposition and intimidation...Likewise, we will fight for a bilateral verifiable arms freeze and a reduction in the arms race. We will emphasize bilateral and multilateral over unilateral actions and assume creative and aggressive leadership internationally in keeping our responsibilities as a world power. We will seek normalized ties with all nations and will pursue unconditional dialogue but never compromise our basic national security interests, our transcendent values and our principles.

Thomas Jefferson once observed that "no man has a natural right to commit aggression on the equal rights of another." Despite this wise admonition, Ronald Reagan has led us down a shameful course of retreat from civil rights and women's rights. He has opposed the ERA, retarded civil rights enforcement, presided over the demise of the Civil Rights Commission and instructed the government's lawyers to oppose affirmative action and other needed equitable

Giving Positive Motivation and Practical Help: Upward Bound

by Donette Wilson and
Segun Eubanks
Nummo Staff

Many studies have shown that urban public schools have not sufficiently prepared young minority and low-income students for post-secondary education.

When a student begins to do poorly or to show low motivation toward his or her education the student is often ignored and discourgaged or even rejected by the school system.

For students who have the potential to excel but who have never been given the opportunity or encouragement, there is a place for them to turn to for help. Upward Bound is a federally-funded, college-preparatory program designed to provide positive motivation and an extra push for low-income or first-generation students, those whose parents do not have college degrees.

There are over 440 Upward Bound programs nationwide and one of the most renowned is UMass/Amherst's Upward Bound (UB) program in the New Africa House.

Charles Bohdi has been the Director of the Amherst program for four years and Assistant Director Bryant "Mr. B" Lewis started at UB as a summer counselor nine years ago.

Upward Bound developed out of the Great Society programs of Lyndon Johnson in the mid-1960's. Amherst UB was first funded in 1966 under the School of Education and is currently under the division of Student Affairs.

"The true founders of Upward Bound," said Lewis, "were the brothers and sisters in the street who created the pressures to make the government respond to the needs of the people."

UB offers a wide range of academic resources to qualified students. The Amherst program recruits ninth and tenth grade students from Springfield, Holyoke, Amherst and other Western Mass areas. The program assesses the students' academic standing and their potential for college-preparatory work.

Once students are accepted into UB they participate in academic, career and family counseling as well as tutorials and cultural activities. The program works closely with parents, educating them around their roles and responsibilities in the school systems. UB also helps students schedule the proper classes and meet with guidance counselors and teachers.

There are two phases to the Upward Bound academic program, the first of which is a six-week summer program on the UMass campus which all UB students attend. Fifteen college-preparatory and basic skills courses are offered for students to either get ahead for the coming year or to make up courses they failed the previous year.

There is a pre-test that enables the placing of students into the proper classes and a post-test that measures the amount of growth by the students. "These tests give us a much better idea of the students' growth," said Lewis. "Many of our students increase two to three grade levels over the summer."

Along with the academic portion of the summer program a great many other activities are offered. Arts activities such as dance, drama, music, martial arts, etc. play an important role in developing students' creativity and cultural awareness. Students also participate in sports activities, field trips, and education projects.

There are four UB programs on campus over the summer and they participate in many inter-program activities. "We have sports competitions and a college bowl every summer," said Lewis. "It gives students a chance to meet people from different places."

The second phase of UB takes place during the regular academic year. Area coordinators go to the areas to counsel students and are responsible for tutorials and meetings.

Perhaps the most important service that UB offers its students is giving them ongoing encouragement and confidence. Mulazimuddin Rasool, Springfield Area Coordinator, says, "We are creating the type of environment to help our students grow and thrive."

Rasool has developed a Needs Assessment program that will give UB a better idea of what skills are most needed by students. "Study skills, math skills and confidence are what is most needed," said Rasool.

Upward Bound serves all types of students although it is often considered to be a "minority" program. "This is a grave misperception that we are trying to change," said Lewis. Bohdi added that there is a federal mandate for the program to reflect the ethnic composition of the school systems they work with.

Although direct service to students ends once they complete high school, many UB college students come back to help their younger peers, see friends, share experience and to get a little more encouragement from the Upward Bound staff. "The program is designed not only to get students into college but to provide them with the skills to complete a college curriculum," said Bohdi.

Analida Munera, a 1982 Upward Bound graduate, is a good example of the program's success. Munera is a sophomore at UMass majoring in Hotel, Restaurant and Travel Administration. She is also a Resident Assistant (RA) in Emerson dormitory.

Munera said that UB helped her "get adjusted to college life." Academically Munera adds that "Rhetoric and pre-calculus at 'the Bound' gave me a head start. I knew what to expect. My time management and study habits improved." Munera said that UB helped all the students see the benefits of education.

"Now that I'm at UMass, they (UB staff members) always keep in touch...UB is a very good connection to have. It's like a big family," said Munera. She added that UB is very supportive but the individual student must take advantage of the opportunity offered.

Like all human services programs, Upward Bound has had to struggle very hard for sufficient funding in recent years. During the last funding cycle Reagan proposed budget cuts that would eliminate 370 UB programs.

Due to strong lobbying by the New England Association of Educational Opportunity and the National Council of Educational Opportunity Association, the cutbacks were stopped. "We were able to turn the problem around," said Bohdi, "and instead of a two-thirds cut we received a $156,000 increase." Bohdi added, "It is quite a statement to get through the guns of Ronald Reagan with an increase."

"There is a need to see the program continue," said Lewis. "Our success has been unequivocably proven."

The battle is still not over for the Upward Bounds across the country. In Reagan's most recently submitted budget proposal, the request for UB was zero.

Media Prints, Sandinist Style

by Brenda Ling

"NICARAGUA: Images of the Revolution," is an exhibit of Nicaraguan posters and prints presently on display at the Augusta Savage Memorial Art Gallery in the New Africa House. UMass student and WMLASC member, Brandon Fine gathered the collection while in Nicaragua from February to June of this year.

In a printed statement at the gallery, Fine describes the exhibit as containing messages from the "streets, markets, schools, factories and rural communities (about the) history, health care, military defense and adult education" of the Nicaraguan people since the Sandinista victory of 1979.

In an interview, Fine said that when he traveled to Nicaragua on his own, "the posters appeal(ed) to me politically and visually." When he approached poster hangers, including members of the Sandinist Worker's Confederation, students, workers and church members, most people gave him a free copy. Several of the posters he bought.

Of the printed messages, many celebrate the Nicaraguan people's strength, support people's war and condemn U.S. intervention. One newspaper page commemorates the anniversary of the death of Augusto Sandino, the Nicaraguan leader who was killed by U.S.-backed Nicaraguan National Guards in 1934.

Fine acknowledges that wide use of these media prints points not only to the success of the Sandinistas' literacy campaign, but also to the reality that Nicarguans' daily lives are not abstracted from politics. Says Fine, "This is both propaganda and education."

"NICARAGUA: Images of the Revolution" runs at the Augusta Savage Art Gallery through December 2.

I will fight for the ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment. Likewise, I intend to make enforcement of the Voting Rights Act and other civil rights laws a major national issue in the 1984 campaign. Blacks, Hispanics, women and the poor are not apathetic; we are oppressed....Thus, this candidacy is much more than just a man running for an office.

...This administration has turned its back on civil rights, human rights and the poor, both in this country and in the world....My concern is to chart a new course...to fight for education based on one's ability rather than the ability to pay; to fight to provide health care for all Americans on the basis of need and not wealth...to provide a strong and adequate national defense, but end the massive waste, fraud, abuse and other unnecessary costs of the military; to campaign on behalf of a rational and fair immigration policy; to move beyond our current racial, sexual and class battlegrounds to economic and political commongrounds; and to change the present course of our foreign policy so we can again be respected in the world community, not just feared.

...Currently, America rejects and excludes more people than it accepts and includes. Accordingly, I would like to use this candidacy to help build a new rainbow coalition of the rejected that will include Whites, Blacks, Hispanics, Indian and Native Americans, Asians, women, young people, poor people, old people, gay people, laborers, small farmers, small businesspersons, peace activists and environmentalists. If we remain separated, we will forever remain poor and powerless. But, if we come together around our common economic plight and a humane political agenda, we won't be poor and powerless anymore.

ANNOUNCEMENTS

The Afrikan-American Soceity and the Malcolm X Center would like to thank the Office of Third World Afairs headed by Sherwood Thompson and the Third World Caucus for their diligent work throughout the Boston primary and right up to the general election.
By staffing the polls and lending their support toward the King candidacy, they showed that as students they are not removed from their neighborhoods and are willing to do more than just voice their opinion; but work to make their opinions and beliefs become a reality.
Although it's a thankless job, we the community are well aware of your service to the community. Thank you.

Signed,
Michael Nawls, Vice-President, Afrik-Am,
Co-coordinator, Malcolm X Center

On Tuesday, Nov. 15, as we listened to Mel King's concession speech, there was clearly a feeling of victory for the city Boston. Although Mr. King was defeated, never in Boston's history, filled with bussing, corruption, and racism, did a Black have a legitimate chance of winning, until Mel King with his "rainbow coalition," polled 36 per cent of the vote in the primary, and a substantial amount of votes in the general election.

Boston moved closer to the time when a man or woman's race will not play a factor when seeking a political position. We feel Mr. King planted the seed, and maybe on his fifth try, he will wear the title we had hoped he would achieve this past Tuesday, Mayor Mel King.

Signed,
The Malcolm X Center

2,400 UMass workers settle contract with Regents

By BROOKE STATES

Unions representing 2,400 workers at the University of Massachusetts-Amherst campus have reached contract agreements with the Board of Regents of Higher Education. These are the first major collective bargaining agreements in which the Board has been involved.

The Massachusetts Teachers Association (MTA), representing 1,200 secretaries and technical workers signed off on a contract last week which gives them a 19 percent pay raise spread over the next three years, said Winniphred Stone, grievance officer and negotiating committee member.

"We won and strengthened contract language involving health hazards of video display terminals, asbestos, and the right to know about dangerous chemicals," she said.

The MTA also won maternity leave for part-time employees covered by the union.

"This is important because 85 percent of our people are female," Stone said.

"The Board of Regents' bargaining team which included people from this campus and the University President's office in Boston spent a lot of time in caucus among themselves. They did not seem to have a unified game plan," she said.

Local 1776 of the American Federation of City County and Municipal Employees (AFSCME) also signed off on their contract last week. The local represents janitors, food service workers, and maintenance workers at the Amherst campus.

Benefits secured in a contract negotiated by a statewide coalition of AFSCME locals and unions include free tuition for union members at any state college or university except the Worcester Medical school, shift differentials, and a reduction in pay grades from seven to five, meaning that workers can reach their maximum salary in any one grade in five years instead of seven. The contract, which took six months to negotiate, involved 33 meetings between the different parties and contained a 19-percent pay raise spread over three years.

"This is a new contract bargained in a new way with a new employer -- the Regents. It is the first master contract," said Jonathan Tuttle, negotiating committee member and shop steward. Local 1776 had called since 1979 for a unified approach among the different bargaining units.

"There will be no major problems but a few bings at the beginning because we are dealing with a master contract. Once we get by those it will be all right," said Regents Vice Chancellor of Labor Relations Roy Milberry. "We all started the process with a little bit of trepidation. Both sides were a little bit slow in getting off the ground," he said.

According to the Board of Regents press release 98 percent of the classified employees in the Commonwealth's higher education system are covered by the master contract that AFSCME was involved in. However, the Massachussetts Society of Professors, which represents faculty on the Amherst Campus, is still negotiating a contract.

"We have met with the University Presidents's Office 35 to 40 times and are making some progress," Union President and Journalism professor Jim Boylan said.

Science center proposed to help fight competition

By JILL LANG
Collegian Staff

State officials announced yesterday plans for a $6 million science center at the University of Massachusetts designed to help the University and the United States keep ahead of foreign competition in polymer science research.

The funds, which will be part of the capital outlay budget if approved by the legislature will be coupled with $14 million from the private sector, to make the polymer science lab at UMass perhaps the best in the world, according to Gerlad Indelicato, special education assistant to Governor Michael S. Dukakis.

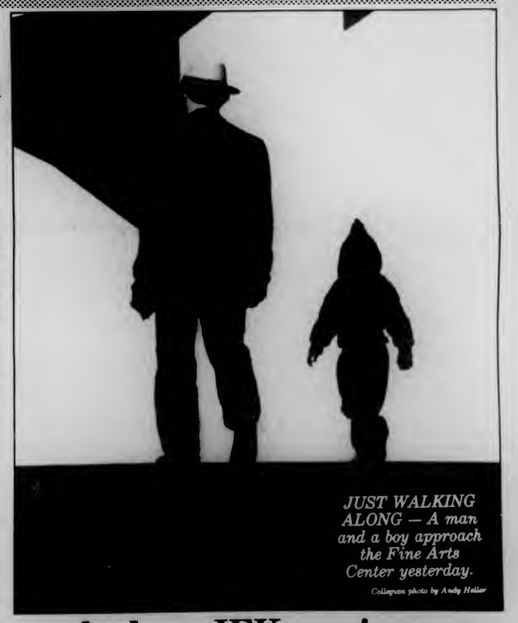
"Japan and Germany, our biggest competitors in the field (of polymer research), are sending their PhD.'s to UMass to be trained."
— Gerald Indelicato, special education assistant to the governor

In an announcement made in the governor's office yesterday morning, Dukakis was joined by State Sens. Chester Atkins (D-Concord) and John Olver (D-Amherst) as well as by University President David C. Knapp and UMass Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey.

"Japan and Germany, our biggest competitors in this field, are sending their PhD.'s to UMass to be trained," Indelicato said yesterday. "Our competitors are looking to us for training."

"There is also great interest from industry, and the governor is delighted to sponsor this type of funding," he said.

Atkins, Olver, Dukakis, Duffey and Knapp were not available for comment.



UMass' existing program in advanced plastics research, a joint venture of the university's chemistry, chemical engineering and polymer science departments has outgrown its quarters and needs sophisticated new equipment to remain competitive, the Associated Press reported yesterday.

The plans call for the creation of a Center for University of Massachusetts — Industry in Research on Polymers. This center would be jointly run and funded by the University, the National Science Foundation and 13 large industrial companies, including Gillette, General Electric and Monsanto.

Dukakis acknowledged that there are "risks" associated with involving profit-oriented corporations in the academic pursuit of knowledge, according to AP reports.

"There is certainly nothing revolutionary about the notion that a center of academic excellence should not scorn economic application," the Governor said.

Polymers are a group of chemical combines with a wide variety of commercial and industrial uses, including synthetic rubber, nylon, rayon and a host of plastics.

Memories evoked on JFK anniversary

By LARRY BOUCHIE
Collegian Correspondent

Warm and sunny weather greeted parade watchers in Dallas twenty years ago today, but in Amherst overcast skies better reflected the tragedy awaiting the nation.

That Friday afternoon at 12:30, Lee Harvey Oswald fired several rifle shots from the sixth floor of the Dallas School Book Depository, killing President John Fitzgerald Kennedy.

William F. Field, who was the University of Massachusetts Dean of Students then as now, recalls immediately telephoning the University Board of Trustees, who were meeting in Boston that afternoon.

"Nobody had the heart to continue as usual when they heard the news," Field said, "so I asked the board if we should close school. They said 'yes.'"

With school closed for the period just before Thanksgiving recess, Field called Peter Pan Bus Lines, knowing that many students would want to go home.

"The buses were lined up and leaving all day, one after the other," Field said.

The Reverend J. Joseph Quigley, director of the Newman Center, was assistant director then.

"It was pandemonium on campus that day. People were fainting and we literally had to hold people up at services. We held special Chapel services all day and night, and many people would come in and just cry," Quigley said.

"Jack Kennedy had been here in October to dedicate the Robert Frost Library at Amherst College, and the news was stupifying," he said. "Many dreams were tied up with him, it seemed to be the end of a new era."

Robert L. Campbell, associate director of UMass Housing Services, was in the Air Force at the time.

"I was at the Almandorf base in Anchorage, Alaska when it happened, and we were immediately put on nationwide high alert status," Campbell said. "Our jet aircraft fighters were then armed with nuclear warheads."

Glenn Gordon, director of the UMass political science department, heard the news at the end of teaching a class at Michigan State University.

"My first impression was that the president of the University had been shot--it was too unbelievable that it had been Kennedy," he said.

The assassination was widely discussed among his fellow teachers, he said. "It was believed that it must have been some right-wing fanatic from Dallas who did it. When it was revealed that Lee Harvey Oswald, who seemed to be more of a left-winger, was responsible, there was an air of disbelief," Gordon said.

University President John W. Lederle, was at the Board of Trustees meeting in Boston. "There were conflicting stories for a while, and we were all in disbelief. We thought that the President was so well-protected. We wondered how the country would carry on without Kennedy," Lederle said.

Hijacker's attempt fails at O'Hare

CHICAGO (AP) -

A man who said he had a bomb commandeered a Republic Airlines DC-9 Monday and demanded to speak to the Rev. Jesse Jackson, but was tackled and subdued by passengers, authorities said.

Four passengers were slightly injured during the scuffle. No bomb was found.

The passengers tied the man "spread-eagle" to the seats, using belts and anything else they could find, said passenger Esther Ahlteen of Sweden.

"He was running around hollering, erratic. He hit one of them passengers - and the passenger hit him back," said Sgt. Terry O'Donnell of the Police Department's special unit at O'Hare International Airport.

The man, identified by authorities as Rasul Ali Shakir and also known as Russell Chappelle, 33, of Detroit, was taken off the plane and into custody by the FBI, who said Shakir is a bus driver for the Detroit Department of transportation.

Lech Walesa plans price protest

WARSAW, Poland (AP) —

Parliament broadened Gen. Wojciech Jaruzelski's ability to crack down on unrest, giving a defense council Monday some of the sweeping powers that were held under martial law.

Unanimous passage of the bill, which has been in the works for at least a month, came a day after Lech Walesa met with underground Solidarity leaders and endorsed a call for protests against the food price hikes the Communist government intends to impose in January.

"The working people cannot agree with the price hikes and it is the duty of the union to organize the struggle in defense of their interests," Walesa said in a joint statement with fugitive leaders Zbigniew Bujak of Warsaw, Bogdan Lis of Gdansk, Tadeusz Jedynak of Katowice and Eugeniusz Szumiejko of Wroclaw.

The meeting with fugitive Solidarity leaders was one of Walesa's boldest acts of defiance since his release from an 11-month martial law internment a year ago.

Asked to comment about Walesa's endorsement, a goverment spokesman, Andrzej Prochwicz, said: "Right now we have more important things on our mind than what Mr. Walesa is doing; mainly at the Sejm," Poland's parliament.

Deployment undaunted by debate

WASHINGTON (AP) —

The United States intends to follow a set schedule for shipping new nuclear missiles to western Europe and will prepare to put Pershing II rockets in West Germany after the German Parliament reaffirms its approval, an administration official said today.

Denying a report in The Washington Post that there would be a nine-month pause — until next September — between the first and second rounds of missile shipments, the official said there is no change in the five-year deployment schedule.

The schedule calls for installing 572 Pershing II and cruise missiles in West Germany, Britain, Italy, Belgium, and the Netherlands through 1988 unless a limitation accord is reached with the Soviet Union.

The first wave of cruise missiles was sent to Britain last Monday. West Germany is next on the schedule. The official, who declined to be identified, said preparations to receive nine Pershing II rockets would be undertaken soon after the West German Parliament, the Bundestag, concludes debate Tuesday.

The missiles, designed to reach Soviet territory, are due to be operational by the end of the year.

Five indicted on $130m tax fraud

NEW YORK (AP) —

Five businessmen were indicted Monday on charges of setting up more than $130 million in false income tax deductions for scores of executives and celebrities, including actor Sidney Poitier and TV producer Norman Lear.

U.S. Attorney Rudolph Giuliani called the 63-count indictment "the most substantial tax fraud ever criminally charged."

He said there was "no evidence that they (the celebrities) were involved in criminal wrongdoing."

The defendants were accused of operating two securities houses in Manhattan, Sentinel Financial Instruments and Sentinel Government Securities, that traded fraudulently in U.S. Treasury securities.

According to the charges, the trading in Treasury notes was fraudulent because the defendants never actually bought or sold any. Meantime, the government charged, they helped clients to $130 million in false income tax deductions based on their purported trades.

When the purported deals lost money, investors could claim tax benefits.

Dukakis wants draft amendments

BOSTON (AP) — A bill that would deny scholarship aid to college students who don't register for the military draft was returned to the Legislature on Monday by Gov. Michael S. Dukakis, who is seeking two amendments.

His proposed changes would deny financial assistance only to those college students actually convicted in court of failure to register and would suspend the law's effective date until after the U.S. Supreme Court rules on the issue.

Both amendments were offered on the floor of the House in September and defeated. The bill won easy approval in the House and Senate after supporters argued that the state should help federal auuthorities enforce the draft law.

The bill, sponsored by state Rep. Walter DeFilippi, R-West Springfield, states: "No scholarship or student loan shall be awarded...to any student who has not registered with the selective service system of the armed forces of the United States."

At stake is an estimated $168 million in aid to higher education distributed by the state. Under the state constitution, both houses of the Legislature must either accept the governor's proposed amendments or resubmit the bill to him. If it is sent back, he must sign it or veto it.

Roadblock constitutionality upheld

GREENFIELD (AP) —

A Franklin County district judge Monday upheld the constitutionality of the state's drunken driving roadblocks, imposed by Gov. Michael S. Dukakis over the July Fourth holiday weekend.

The ruling, by Judge William McDonough, came in a case involving three people who were stopped and arrested July 2 by state police on Route 116 in Sunderland.

The suit was the first to challenge of the legality of the controversial police use of roadblocks.

State police stopped 503 motorists at the Sunderland roadblock and released all but the three defendants and five other drivers. The five were also charged with motor vehicle violations.

The three filed "motions to suppress," charging that the roadblock program violated constitutional standards governing unreasonable searches and seizures.

At a hearing, defense attorney Robert Bray of Greenfield said police detained motorists without cause.

Convicted murderer gets new trial

BOSTON (AP) —

A Somerville man convicted of murder in the clubbing death of an upstairs neighbor he believed was a Russian spy will get a new trial because of a ruling Monday by the state Supreme Court.

A Middlesex County jury had found Robert Guiliana guilty of first-degree murder in the Dec. 15, 1977, slaying of Dorothy Cyr, 47.

But the high court set aside the finding, which carried a mandatory life term without parole, and ordered a new trial for Guiliana, saying there were serious questions about whether he was legally responsible for his actions. "We conclude that the verdict is against the weight of the evidence, and that there is a substantial liklihood of a miscarriage of justice," the court said.

Acid Rain kills 4 out of 5 lakes

BOSTON (AP) —

Four out of every five Massachusetts lakes, streams and reservoirs may have been damaged by acid rain, according to the preliminary results of a statewide survey.

One-fifth of the waterways have been seriously damaged and three-fifths showed some effects from the problem, according to samplings of 1,500 of the state's 2,800 lakes and ponds in the Acid Rain Monitoring Project.

Lt. John Kerry, who has been working on a national solution to the problem, released the results with a promise to press the issue at the next meeting of the National Governors Association.

"We intend to make this a major part of the debate," Kerry said Sunday in Milton while workers monitored Houghton's Pond.

Equity Institute educates about job oppression

By DAVID SUMMERSBY
Collegian Staff

As consultants to corportations, school boards, police departments and political organizations, the Equity Institute in Amherst serves to combat the negative effects of oppression in the workplace.

Co-director Dr. Jean Lester, said the institute conducts broad human relations training to a variety of organizations through workshops, technical assistance and writing of Affirmative Action plans.

"After participating in our workshops people become more comfortable and effective at having a wide range of friendships and relationships. We help people break down the divisions that have been artificially imposed on us towards ethnic groups and social classes," Lester said.

The issues the institute deals with range from racism and sexism to heterosexism, employment discrimination and multi-cultural education, she said.

"Organizations hire us to help them comply with laws of Affirmative Action and to improve their sensitivity of complex human relations issues," she said.

The institute's usual method in consulting, is to do a needs assessment of the organization and, based on that, make recommendations and set up a series of workshops.

Carole Johnson, J.D. co-director of the institute said the workshops emphasize the experiential aspects of racism and sexism but also offer legal information and trace the history and background of the problem.

"We do a lot of role playing in the workshops. We will have people strategize ways that men and women can be more supportive of each other and be more cooperative in the workplace.

"The workshops are very successful, people's behaviors really change," she said.

Another way the institute helps organizations is through technical assistance on issues of Affirmative Action and sexual harassment policy that organizations are having trouble intiating.

Lester also offers private and short term counseling on issues of oppression in which individuals can work out their feelings in a supportive environment.

Although working mostly with outside organizations the institute conducts workshops open to the public on a sliding scale basis.

Besides the co-directors, the institute is comprised of a community intern, two student interns from Smith College and numerous outside consultants.

If interested in contacting the Equity Institute call 256-6902.

Eleventh fire strikes Crampton

By MARY ANNE BEEN
Collegian Staff

Crampton dormitory in the Southwest Residential Area was again the victim of arson this weekend, according to University of Massachusetts Police. Police, the Amherst Fire Department and Environmental Health and Safety responded to three more fires there since Saturday.

The ninth fire in Crampton since Sep.. 25 occurred at 12:51 a.m. Saturday police said, when a bulletin board on the second floor of the east wing was set on fire, according to the police report. Damage was not estimated. There were no injuries.

The 10th and 11th fires occurred within an hour of each other. Papers hung on a wall in the third-floor bathroom in the south wing were set on fire at 10:53 p.m. Sunday, and a plastic trash container and its contents in the third-floor bathroom of the north wing were ignited at 11:47 p.m., police said. There were no injuries. Police said there are no suspects at this time, although all fires are under investigation.

"We're doing as much as we can at this point," said Joseph Zannini, executive director of Housing Services. "Our office is working collaborately with state and campus police. We offer suggestions and supply the police with information that we may have."

Despite the outbreak of so many dormitory fires, Zannini said there has not been any immediate outcry from students wanting to move from either Crampton or Cashin, a dormitory in the Sylvan Residential Area where seven fires have been set in the past month.

"I haven't heard from any student wanting to move because of the fires," Zannini said. "Everything possible would be done to move any student in such an event."

Police report thefts, driving violations

A Honda motorcycle valued at $500 was reported stolen Saturday by a Swiss Village resident, Amherst Police said.

A stereo cassette player valued at $300 was also reported missing from a parked car at Bedford Court Saturday. A Taylor Street resident reported the theft of another cassette player Friday, valued at $175.

A 44-year-old Sunderland man was arrested at 1:40 a.m. Saturday on Belchertown Road and charged with driving while intoxicated (DWI).

Three Brandywine men were charged with disturbing the peace at 5 a.m. Sunday after police responded five times to complaints about a loud party. Two of the men, ages 19 and 20 were UMass students, and an 18-year-old was also charged with being a person under 20 in possession of alcohol.

A Northwood resident, 19, was charged with DWI at 2 a.m. Saturday on Rte. 116.

A 21-year-old woman from Port Washington, NY, was arrested and was charged at 4:40 a.m. Thursday with driving to endanger, driving on a sidewalk, and driving with no license.

Hunger drive raises $2,600

By CAMDEN PEIRCE
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts students Thursday raised more than $2600 for OXFAM America, a national organization dedicated to addressing the problem of hunger.

Mark Helfant, president of the UMass Hunger Task Force, who coordinated the event, said 1695 students on the University Food Services meal plan, 300 more than last year, fasted Thursday night, resulting in a University Food Services donation of $1941.25 to OXFAM America. The figure donated represents the cost of the food the students would have eaten.

Students who didn't wish to fast, or who were not on the meal plan, could give directly to Oxfam American by dropping off donation's at a table in the Campus Center. Helfant said the Hunger Task Force raised about $650 in cash contributions, including donations of $100 from both Earth Foods and the People's Market.

"This was the first increase in a while," he said. "It's not just the publicity...I think it shows people are becoming concerned about suffering in the world and what we can do about it. That we got an increase says a lot." Helfant said the money donated to Oxfam American will go to development projects in Asia, Africa and Latin America.

The Hunger Task Force is looking into the possibility of another fast next spring, but Helfant said they are still in the process of deciding what the organization is all about.

He said the group hopes to start printing an educational newsletter next semester to address the issue of hunger in the United States and the world, and the politics which relate to hunger.

Program seeks holiday hosts

By MARY-SHEILA LOUGHLIN
Collegian Staff

Amherst area families are encouraged to share Thanksgiving dinner and the coming holidays with one of 80 Asian scholars and students under a host-family program sponsored by the American Culture/Language Program at the University of Massachusetts.

Most of the students and scholars working and studying at the University are here without their families, and many who stay two or three years do not see their families at all during this time, said Jacqeline Mellen, coordinator of the UMass Culture/Language Program.

Two-thirds of the UMass students and scholars represented by the program are from the People's Republic of China, and the rest are from Korea, Japan, Taiwan and Hong Kong, Mellen said.

In addition to some language difficulties, they may also have problems in adjusting to multi-cultural American society.

"Through the host-family program, we hope these scholars and students will have a more comfortable stay and also learn something about the American culture through the family," she said.

"In the past the program has proved mutually beneficial to the host and the visitor," Mellen said. "The time shared together has helped in better understanding cultural differences and also in promoting better international understanding."

Since the program began three years ago, "We have received favorable response from families in the Amherst area. Faculty and students at the University have also participated in the program," she said.

Seven people have been placed with host families so far. We hope to get everyone placed during the holiday season or even during the Spring," Mellen said.

Students pensive the day after

Michael Wasserman

By DANIEL SOBEL
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts students interviewed in the Campus Center yesterday said a movie shown on national television Sunday night depicting the effects of nuclear war left them "freaked out," depressed, or just laughing.

But 77 percent of the persons interviewed said they at least watched the film, The Day After, and many thought it was an understatement of the actual problems a nuclear war and its aftermath would bring.

The Day After, shown on ABC-TV Sunday evening, dramatized the explosion of nuclear warheads on the town of Lawrence, Kansas and surrounding communities. The Boston Globe estimated 50 million people across the nation watched the film.

Michael Wasserman, 21, a political science and Spanish major, said the movie was overwhelming.

"Watching those huge missiles come out of the ground freaked me out," he said.

Wasserman added he thought the discussion moderated by Ted Koppel which followed the film was fantastic and the film would help discussion on the nuclear issue.

Jill Okun, a 19 year-old English major said the movie depressed her very much. "I think it would be much worse than they showed," she said. "They couldn't show how bad it would be."

Richard Forman, a 20 year-old electrical engineering major, said the film made him realize how privileged he was.

"I tried starting my car this morning and it worked," he said, referring to the scene which showed thousands of cars stalled on the highway immediately after the nuclear explosions.

Sociology major, Naomi Abraham, 19, watched it with 20 other people.

"It was understated," she said. "If nuclear war was to happen there would be no survival. I don't think civil defense is possible."

Of the people with whom Doreen Fleming, a 19 year-old English major, was watching the movie, "a lot were laughing. They said it would never happen," she said Fleming said she believes there is a possibility of nuclear war occurring and she felt sorry for the people in the film left living. "I'd rather die," she said.

"I feel we do need nuclear arms for political balance," said Scott Maxwell, 19, a communications studies major. "If we let our defenses down, Syria and others will be probing at us," he said.

Seminar advocates political rights in workplace

By ANNEMARIE MALEY
Collegian Correspondent

The democratized workplace was presented as a successful alternative to the traditional business hierarchy in a seminar held at the University of Massachusetts Friday.

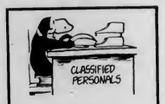
Grant Ingle, a private business consultant who also works in the University office of Human Relations, conducted the seminar which introduced workplace innovations and their underlying dynamics.

"Workplace democracy is simply the extension of political rights into the workplace," Ingle said.

A worker cooperative differs from a conventional company in that all those who work in the company also own the company and can vote to elect all managers and determine company policy, he said. Further, Ingle said, workers in this system share all company profits.

There are approximately 30 worker cooperatives in the western Mass. area, including Pelham Auto and the Earth Foods and People's Market student coops at UMass, Ingle said.

Digital Equipment Corporation has also experimented with innovative workplace ideas by establishing small "work teams" in their Enfield, Conn. office. These groups are responsible for coordinating all facets of production, including shipping, receiving and equipment testing, he said.



The nine-month-old plan has been successful so far, Ingle said.

Enfield Digital Plant Manager Bruce Dillingham said a sense of "social justice" and the belief that expansion and development should benefit all levels of the workforce motivated the company to implement the plan.

Friday's seminar, "Lessons from Democratized Workplaces: Implications for Innovation in Traditional Organizations," was one in a series sponsored by the Five College Center on Work and Democracy in conjunction with several other business and labor-related organizations at UMass.

The bi-monthly seminars are held to "promote dialogue and discussion in this area," and the project also offers a four-course certificate program on the subject at Hampshire College, Ingle said.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The legacy will live on

He was young, energetic, and courageous — he represented a new look a new outlook to America. His eloquence charmed America's heart while his idealism moved America's soul.

On this day, the twentieth anniversary of the assasination of President John F. Kennedy, people in this Commonwealth, the nation, and throughout the world will pause — perhaps only if for a time — and reflect upon what history has written.

Every November since 1963 television programs, newspapers, and magazines have been filled to the brink with tributes and reflections about John F. Kennedy as president, and more importantly as part of a movement in America. And yet it has been in 1983, more than any other time, that our country has rejuvenated his spirit and drive by redefining and recommitting ourselves to those ideals and principles which he stood up and spoke out for so courageously.

Reuven M. Carlyle

At this point, there are those (especially of JFK's generation) who may question what gives a young, inexperienced student at the University of Massachusetts, who was but a twinkle in his mother's eye in 1963, or for that matter any young person, the right or the ability to speak out in honor of this great figure of our history. Granted, one third of today's population is too young to remember JFK. Our knowledge of him comes through television, history books, writings, and stories from those who did. Yet there are three fundamental reasons why I personally, and as a member of the young generation feel an inextricable bond with the late President Kennedy.

Firstly, as a teenager growing up on Capitol Hill as a U.S. Congressional Page for three years, I learned that the spirit of JFK is not only living, but an everpresent and powerful force within the people and institutions of the United States Government. A day does not go by, ever, when a representative or a sentor does not quote, compare, or reflect upon the life of President Kennedy. I learned that all peoples whether Democrat or Republican, liberal or conservative, Black or white, male or female can all refer to the wisdom of John Fitzgerald Kennedy for their purpose. He spoke for all Americans. He rose above politics of selfishness to Government of purpose, from special interests to common objectives.

The second connection is the relevance and importance of those issues which JFK addressed, to today's world. President Kennedy's greatest ideal was peace on Earth, as he stated it, "Together we will save our planet or together we will perish in it's flame." It was under his administration that the U.S. and the U.S.S.R. signed the first Test Ban Treaty.

Yet the issues do not end with nuclear proliferation. JFK addressed the issues of "permanent unemployment insurance," "medical care for the aged," and of course "higher education in America." These are all issues which cry out because of inattention and indifference to today's world.

This brings us to the third and probably the most important bond between President Kennedy and my generation of Americans. JFK appealed to the youth — not a time of life but a state of mind. He challenged young America with "a call to action" JFK was the first to admit that the objectives and goals he strived for would not be met during his day; — yet he took the first step. With that in mind, I think it is fair for me, as a member of the young generation, to question the present leaders of our Nation and ask, "What have you done for America in your day and generation."

What it all really adds up to is "action." In his inaugural address JFK announced to the world that the torch of leadership had been passed to a new generation of Americans. Now, in 1983, I believe the time has come once again for that torch to pass on to a new, courageous, dedicated generation of Americans. This generation has been raised in a country haunted with assasinations, divided by Vietnam, and discontent with corrupt politicians. America once again calls for a new look and a new outlook.

Living scared in the Atomic Age

Josh Meyer

The student had just sat through "The Day After," having spent two hours interspersed with grave seriousness and nervous jokes. She sat amidst the people now quiet, who had not fully realized the impact the show had had on their consciousness. She didn't see how anyone could have known what to expect.

She looked at the pages of notes she had taken during the show — and she listened to the panel discussion, where "great men" on the screen were throwing numbers around like they somehow had the answer to this nuclear madness. She heard Ted Koppel, moderator of the discussion, ask "How does one live in a nuclear world?" and someone reply, "There's no conceivable way out."

Her friends were dispersing, and she wondered how many were now thinking of calling their loved ones. And she thought of her loved ones, and how far apart they had been of late, and not merely by distance.

She thought back to the movie, and the tension and eventual chaos of the people during the air strike. Screaming amidst the air raid sirens, and the ridiculously futile attempts at looting food and supplies, something that would have taken months to do in real life. She thought of the terror at the heart of the people who thought their world had ended, and the grief and aftershock of those who realized that they had survived. She saw doctors try to treat the wounded; most without any experience with radiation sickness, fallout, severe emotional trauma, physical violence and the other effects of the blasts. She saw a doctor, who had given his last remaining days waging an insurmountable effort to help others, crawl back to his house so he could die beside his family. And she saw that same doctor curse a dying old man and his family off his property, only to be offered precious bits of food by the man he cursed to Hell. The men separated and then came together again, and in what seemed their last living moments they hugged each other, bowing their heads together in some strange reverence, and by this contact pulling the last strands of hair off of their decaying heads.

She thought back, even further into the show, when the President of the United States announced that the missile exchange had ended, and that there had been "no surrender from the principles of freedom and democracy." She thought it strange how familiar this voice and message sounded, and she thought it funny how similar the world events of her day were to the ones preceding the "imaginary" holocaust: so funny it scared her.

The student sat in front of her typewriter and turned on some music. She sat some more. Wondering where everyone was, she looked out the window, into the bright, starlit November sky. It's funny she thought, the trivial little things that shot through her head at such an important time. She had so much to do, and so little time. And now she began to think that time was running out. She hoped friends would stop by, for she was alone now, and it seemed that nothing mattered more than being with close friends. At times when the future seemed most uncertain, she had always wanted to party, be cavalier, and live "for the present."

She thought to watch TV, to laugh, and shrug it off, to got out and find a party. There was nothing she could do about nuclear proliferation and the state of things to come. So why wallow in self-despair? She wondered how many out there shared her "optimism," and how many others had been filled with grim but futile determination to go out and change the world. Perhaps she too should get involved — there certainly were enough groups at UMass — she even knew some of the most dedicated activists, who seemed to be fighting windmills while all the time arguing amongst themselves on how to take the first step.

At least now the activists had a common enemy — a tide of conservatism so strong and demented that it had hit home, in the form of a Young Republicans club, who blindly supported the President's insane nuclear confrontational politics to the hilt. She thought of the elected "leader" of our country who said that "the only reason we have (nukes) is to see that they aren't used," and his righteous indignation over the wrong attitude of the "other side." She thought of the mutual distrust and paranoia that her President had provoked, edging the world ever closer to Armageddon time.

But wait! The world was at a critical time — with Soviet leader Yuri Andropov feared dead, and elections in her own country on the horizon, she dreamed of having people represent her and the other side that respected our awesome nuclear destructive capability, instead of waving nukes in the air as silly bargaining chips. So, yes, there was something she could do — get her ass in gear and vote, and maybe even organize! Reagan and his miserable cohorts often won elections on as little as thirteen percent of the vote, and there must be something she could do to get the bastards out of office. And then she wouldn't have to spend time worrying so much.

Her thoughts again drifted back to the show, to the two old men at the end, reduced to blind animal rage, fear, and then love — the barest of all human emotion, cradling each other as though they were the last creatures on the Earth. She thought that they were crying, but she wasn't sure. But did details really matter that much? She herself had almost cried, and she did not know why exactly. And when she noticed this, she smiled. And then she did the weirdest thing — she started to laugh.

Time for thanks, and thought

To the Editor,

Dear Amherst Citizens;

As Thanksgiving approaches, many of us look forward to having days off work, spending time with our friends and families, enjoying the harvest and being grateful for what we have.

But to some of us, it also brings thoughts of sadness. We want to share a story about the man for whom your workplace and this town are named:

In 1763, the commander of Fort Pitts was negotiating with local Indian Chiefs. Under orders from General Jeffrey Amherst, he intentionally gave the Native American Indians "gifts" of blankets from the smallpox hospital. A fatal epidemic of smallpox soon spread among the Indians. We mourn the loss of thousands of these Native Americans who harmoniously lived and worked the land here in Western Massachusetts.

During the coming holidays, we feel it is important, though difficult, to consider the continuing violence to people of color, as well as the everyday violence to women, Jews, gay men and lesbians. Such irreverence for human life has also brought the threat of nuclear destruction to our world.

We invite you to spend a moment at your Thanksgiving dinner acknowledging those who have been killed as part of United States policy. There will be a public mourning at the Amherst Common at 5:15 p.m. on Tuesday, November 22, which you are welcome to join.

We express our hopefulness for the time when we will cherish our human differences, living free from fear of violence and weapons. We yearn and hope for a day when we all can be truly thankful.

U-store "anti-handicapped?"

To the Editor,

This letter is in regards to the inaccessability of the University Store to individuals confined to wheelchairs. As such an individual, I have encountered enormous difficulty maneuvering independently about the store. The narrow aisles and numerous corners make turns virtually impossible without knocking the stock off the shelves. The clothing section in particular is so tightly packed that I find myself literally being slapped in the face by merchandise and often have clothing fall into my lap. Items hanging on the walls are frequently too high to inspect or obtain without assistance. And finally, simply locating items in this jungle of obstacles adds further inconvenience to an already frustrating, fatiquing and time-consuming task.

The University of Massachusetts prides itself on its social awareness and sensitivity to the oppressed members of its population. Yet, its own University Store demonstrates in its current design an incredible insensitivity to the needs of the members of the handicapped student population.

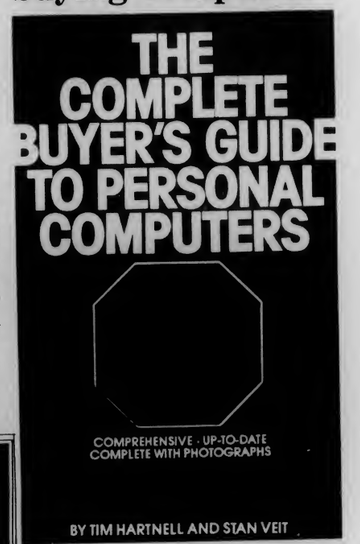
A book that helps take the byte out of buying computers

THE COMPLETE BUYER'S GUIDE TO PERSONAL COMPUTERS
By Tim Hartnell and Stan Veit
400 pp. Paperback
$4.95
Bantam Books

By DAVID TAYLOR
Collegian Correspondent



Ten years ago the smallest computers filled large rooms and cost millions of dollars. Today there is a microcomputer as small as a textbook costing under $50. The invention of the micro-processor in the early '70s has revolutionized computer design allowing most people access to high technology for very little cash. Just under half of the citizens in the U.S. at present own, or have access to a computer, and the number is rising rapidly. The Complete Buyer's Guide sets out to introduce the layman to the bewildering array of machines on the personal computer market.

Beginning with a brief but interesting history of computing, the guide suggests what one should look for when selecting a machine, and which micros offer the best facilities for particular applications. Later in the book, presuming that the reader has by then decided upon which computer suits them best and has bought it, the authors give some basic advice on programming and a few simple, non-machine-specific example programs. The book closes with a quick glance at the way in which computer technology is developing and some possible predictions for the future.

But by far the greatest part of the book is filled with the specifications of virtually every personal computer on the U.S. market today - their processor type, language, memory size, expandability, best and worst features, and cost. Unfortunately, because of the manner in which these machine analyses are written, they will probably mean little to the layman hunting his first computer. The 'at-a-glance' bold-faced summaries of each machine are inconsistent in their format, making comparison between one micro and another difficult.

Technical language is liberally sprinkled throughout the text and left unexplained by the feeble glossary, and what began with potential for the first time buyer eventually ends up as a collection of bewilderingly superficial specification sheets. Such information can easily be picked up at any dealer, where hands-on experience will in a few minutes surpass anything offered by a book such as this. The programs at the end of the book are all in a general BASIC language and are inferior to most programs in every machine's user manual.

Perhaps the one redeeming feature of this book is the final section of "Resources" which lists User Clubs, publications and other information sources for each machine family - a comprehensive listing I have seen nowhere else. A book which started out with fine potential, The Complete Buyer's Guide To Personal Computers ultimately fails because it offers no more information than one can find in a news-stand computer magazine.

Editor's Note: Due to a technical foul-up, last Thursday's Live Wire listed a band called Rapture of the Dope. Those of you who are familiar with them knew it should have read Rapture of the Deep, and now those of you who aren't know, too. Sorry, Dave.

Chaka Khan couldn't keep 'em dancing

CHAKA KHAN AND PIECES OF A DREAM
Saturday, Nov. 19
Fine Arts Center

By JILL LANG
Collegian Staff

In the Lobby of the Fine Arts Center, there are signs reading "No Dancing in the Balconies." After Saturday's concert, however, it was obvious that these signs weren't really needed anyway.

Chaka Khan, the "Queen of Funk," did an 11 song set and one encore. The word which best describes here performance is disappointing. Chaka didn't seem to know where she was ("You know, no matter what they say, Boston is a real rockin' town...") or what she was doing. Two or three times, it seemed she forgot the words to songs, and she also wandered off stage several times.

There were several highpoints, though. Chaka and guitarist Tony Maiden (from Rufus) sang a duet of "Stop on By," that was well harmonized and executed. "Tell Me Something Good" was also well done, although the sing along Chaka requested from the audience trivialized things a bit.

Even the encore, "Ain't Nobody," Chaka's recent hit, was disappointing.

The audience's responses were lukewarm at times, reflecting Chaka's performance. No one wanted to respond that way, but it was hard to get excited about something that wasn't there.

Pieces of a Dream, a Grover Washington, Jr. produced group from Philadelphia, was wonderful as the opening act. If they could have played all night, the evening might have been justified.

The four member group, made up of James Lloyd, on keyboards, Cedrik Napoleon on bass and vocals, Curtis Harmon on drums and Randy Bowland on guitar played a seven song set, which was clean and precise from beginning to end.

The only vocal song of the set, "It's Time For Love," is from their upcoming album, and although short, was a nice, jazzy love song.

Pieces of a Dream closed with their best known song, "Mount Airy Groove," a tune which brought anyone who was still sitting to their feet...and readied the audience for a rowdy, rockin' performance by Chaka Kahn.

Too bad it never came.

Dadavision: no-sanity radio

By Howard W. Campbell, Jr.
Special to the Collegian

"April 21, 1983" - a song by the Two Tonys featuring a random choice of words and chords from a dictionary selected by throwing dice;

"Trust Best Friends" - a catchy rap tune by the Dadavision Band whose words were lifted from an article in Reader's Digest magazine;

"Here Come the Crocodiles" - a doom-laden dance number by Two Mouth Luke where all the strings to all the instruments are tuned to the same note.

These are just a few of the minor masterpieces aired by the Dadavision radio collaborative Wednesday nights from 10 p.m. to 2 a.m. on WMUA 91.1 f.m.

The weekly radio shows are three-ring collages of music, television and radio snippets, live interviews, comedy, drama, and a host of other madness - all chopped up, pared down, and put back together in a way that can only be described as "Dadavision."

"I like using things that already exist for a purpose other than what they were meant for," Dadavision Ringmaster Dna (sic) Gentes said in an interview, conducted while dubbing a broadcast of the Hindenburg explosion over African drum-dance music.

The experiment was an unqualified success, as are most of their experiments. The tense, pushed-over-the-edge quality of the disaster broadcaster's voice blended well with the insistent, primitive drumbeat, giving this listener a sense that the end is near.

Gentes spends hours every week in local libraries, record stores, and other places searching for such combinations for his show. He also spends hours behind the controls of the mini-studio in his apartment, mixing this tape with that record, this interview with that film score, until the product is worthy to be called "Dadavision."

But all that is Dadavision is not mere madness. Gentes and his crew also provide a healthy dose of the best new wave, rap, dub, movie, soundtracks, nostalgic music..."If it fits, it's there," Gentes said.

Dadavision was born on Jan. 20, 1981, the day Ronald Reagan was inaugurated and the hostages freed from Iran. Gentes and his crew were at a friend's house watching the event on television, and there happened to be some musical instruments within reach.

"We came up with this wretched garbage," he said. "But we were so surprised we could make music at all that we started doing it a lot."

Each resulting session sported a new side of this blooming Dadavision sound, but usually involved a different set of musical concepts. For instance, Solid Fun (due to appear at the annual WMUA extravaganza at the Hangar One early December) is the Dadavision cover band - alternately praising and butchering songs from the past and present.

They like the music from the sessions so much that they'd make a name for each incarnation. Names of bands under the Dadavision umbrella include the Sea Pigs, Sick Day, the Scoops, Noisivision (also called the Palindromes), and the Avante Bards.

Each Dadavision radio show is as different as all of their bands. All are highly recommended to those interested in hearing how familiar sounds can be made into something new and fresh - in the tradition of Brian Eno, David Byrne, Laurie Anderson, and others in the field of using "found" sounds to make music.

"It's more fun that listening to someone play popular records," Gentes said.

Boston a stop for famous paintings

AMERICAN ART EXHIBITION
Museum of Fine Arts, Boston

By MELISSA K. GRAHAM
Collegian Correspondent

Last weekend was the last chance for anyone interested in late 18th and 19th century American art to see the spectacular exhibition at the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston. For those of you who are going to Washington during intercession, however, you are in luck. The 110 masterpieces will be shown at the Corcoran Gallery of Art in Washington D.C. from December 7, 1983 through February twelfth, 1984. So if you plan to be in the city, make a visit that will be well worth your time and money.

This exhibition is special in that it reflects a new interest in American art in both America and Europe. These paintings range from artists as diverse as the Bostonian colonial portraitist John Singleton Copley to the master painter of native landscapes, Frederic Church. It gives a real sample of what American painting is all about; the early settlers' doubt that art and culture would ever prosper on American soil would vanish after one look at these magnificent works of art.

I found the landscapes to be the most breathtaking works. Thomas Cole, Fitz Hugh Lane, and Frederic Church all exemplify the kind of landscaped painted in the 1830's. Cole brings to life the American wilderness with a wonderful sensibility to the beauty of native mountains and draws the eye, almost mesmorizing in their brilliance. Church, who was undeniably a favorite with many of the visitors to the exhibition, caught my undivided attention as well. His amazingly large canvases served to emphasize the open vastness of the New World, creating a feeling for the enormous opportunity of expansion that was going on at that time.

The exhibition also consisted of genre painting, represented by the great American artists George Bingham and William Sidney Mount. Bingham was raised in the west, and his paintings reflect the simplicity of river life with their classical lines and carefly balance. This life is portrayed as very easy-going, with men floating lazily by in river boats, rather than depicting scenes of hard labor. Both Mount and Bingham's works reflect their belief in the American dream, where optimism abounds.

The post-civil war period is represented by works of J.A.M. Whistler, the illusionist William Harnett, Mary Cassatt of the French Impressionist school, Winslow Homer, and Thomas Eakins. The famous painting of Whistler's "Mother" is also here. Its abstract qualities as well as its careful balance of space and color sets it apart as a classic. Winslow Homer's works of rocky coastlined shores and outdoor scenes are marvelous in their tough yet appreciative tribute to nature. The exhibition then ends with an enormous work of Thomas Eakins "The Gross Clinic," a realistic portrayal of a rather bloody operation which uncompromisingly reveals the importance of a surgeon's work.

My only regret is that the show has left the museum for now. Those of you fortunate art enthusiasts who may be in Paris from March 17th to June 11th, 1984, please go to the Grant Palais after a visit to the Louvre. You'll find there is much in American Art to appreciate.

The reknowned "Whistler's Mother" is part of the American Art Exhibition to be displayed in Boston, Washington and Paris.

UMass men's swimming optimistic

By ED HAYWARD
Collegian Correspondent

By having a young and large squad, coach Russ Yarworth feels this could be one of "the strongest years ever" for the University of Massachusetts men's swimming team.

"This is the biggest squad we've ever had," said Yarworth. "The large size will promote competition and competition breeds excellence. I'm really excited about this season."

The team only lost four members from last year's squad which was 4-7 in dual meet competition and was ranked tenth in New England. This year freshmen make up half of the team.

Yarworth feels this has given the team a new and positive identity: one that stresses hard work in practice to improve and develop.

Yarworth is looking to a couple of freshman to perform well this year. Rick Bishop from Newton, Mass. is outstanding in freestyle and butterfly and should do well and possibly place at the New England championships this year. However, at the moment he is hampered by a shoulder injury.

Mike Hoover, another newcomer, from Eddison N.J. is "the best athlete I've ever coached. He has unlimited potential," said Yarworth.

Returning members like senior co-captain Chris Porter, one of the best freestylers in New England and Paul McNeil, holder of three Minuteman records, are swimming better than last year and are expected to contribute heavily. The team will miss their other captain Phil Surrette who is being red-shirted this year.

"This team has good depth and will be very strong in the distance events. Our only weakness will be in the sprints," Yarworth said in evaluating the team. He feels his 400 meter medley relay team is one of the best in New England.

SMOOTH — Rosemary Kelsull of the women's swimming team glides through the water in an earlier meet this season. The men's team hopes to move with such precision to a winning season.

Yarworth has established several individual and team records to be ahieved this season: every swimmer is working to beat his own personal best times. The team hopes to break every record in the UMass book, attain a winning dual meet record, and in the top ten in New England.

The team has set its sights on the New England Championships, the last meet of the year. They will be "tapering down" in practice throughout the year in preparation for it. This may hurt their dual meet record, said Yarworth, but the New England's is the most important as far as they are concerned.

For the first time ever, UMass will be competing in the Atlantic 10 Championship meet. There they will take on strong teams like West Virginia, Penn. State, and Temple. Yarworth feels this will give the team recognition and aid in future recruiting.

But the present is what Yarworth is excited about. "We've been having good practices and everyone is working hard with a lot of enthusiasm. We're anticipating a fine season."

Wright named as Athlete-of-the-year

The late John Wright of the University of Massachusetts and Nick Saunders of Boston University have been named 1982-83 Athletes-of-the-year by the New England Track Coaches Association.

Wright, who died in a swimming accident at Puffers Pond last August, is the Association's Track Athlete of the Year. He was a two year captain for the Minutemen, named MVP of his team, and was high point scorer. During his career, he won both the Eastern Conference and New England indoor and outdoor high hurdle titles establishing a record in the New Englands (7.41).

Wright also finished third in the outdoor IC4A's last spring, the highest place for a New England hurdler since 1979. His award will be presented posthumously to his Mother, Mrs. Carol Wright of Dorchester, Mass.

Runnerup to Wright was Brendon Quinn of Providence College and Ireland. Quinn was the Big East and IC4A champion in crosscountry and the 5000m and 3000m steeplechase events.

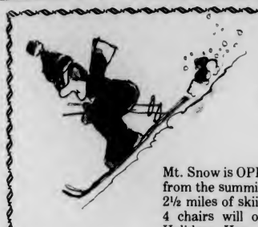
graduation only 5 schools were interested in him because of his size. Coach Valvano had no second thoughts about signing Spud Webb for his final two years of eligibility.



"Too many people get caught up in his size and jumping ability when the fact of the matter is he is a very good basketball player. I don't think he gets the credit for his basketball ability," said Valvano.

Houston, who was ranked in the top five of all preseason polls, was just flat. They could not get into the groove all game. They had a weak game in all departments, especially rebounding.

"We are a lot smaller without Clyde Drexler and Larry Micheaux (who are now in the NBA). We are not able to bang it inside like last year," said Houston coach Guy Lewis.

UM wrestlers open up hopeful season tonight

Faces conference favorite Boston University at 7p.m.

By JOHN BADGER
Collegian Correspondent

The outlook for the 1983-84 University of Massachusetts wrestling team this year is an optimistic one.

"This is the first legitimate lineup I've had here," third year Coach Rick Freitas said. "The last two years we've had an inconsistent roster due to wrestler's academic problems and lack of interest. This year I know I've got a group of athletes who are here to wrestle."

The proof is in the pudding. This year's lineup is saturated with top notch freshmen, four of them state high school champions. "We have the best crop of freshmen in the east," Freitas said.

Massachusetts will start five freshmen in their nine man lineup along with a sophomore, senior and two sophomores. And this young lineup will be tested as the Minutemen open their season against Yankee conference favorite Boston University tonight at the Boyden Auxiliary Gym at 7 p.m.

Starting at 118 lbs. for UMass will be Mass. state high school champion Richard Gardiner. The freshman also placed nineth in last year's USA Junior National Freestyle Wrestling Tournament, which included some of the best high school wrestlers in the country.

Salem's Chris Lee enters the lineup at the 126 lb. spot. The freshman is another state high school and freestyle champion.

At 134 lbs., sophomore Tim Heitzman is someone to watch. As a freshman he was the Mass. high school state champion.

Freshman Wesley Beckwith, another Mass. high school state champ, will be wrestling at 132 lbs. Freshman David MacDonald will be at the 150 mark until Mike Bossi can return to the lineup. Bossi is a pre-season All-American Honorable Mention. Sophomore William Pearsall will start at 158 lbs. for the Minutemen.

Captain Scott McQuaide should have another great year at 167 lbs. The senior placed second in the Yankee Conference last year and third the year before.

Two time high school National team member, Brian Shaughnessy, enters the lineup at the 177 spot. Shaughnessy is also a frosh.

Juniors Francisco Gutierrez and Mike Dwyer will handle the 190 and heavyweight spots respectively. These starters will have to deal with the Terriers tonight.

"It's far from beyond our ability to beat them (BU)," Freitas said. "If we get some wins in the lower weights and score early, we should be able to hold them."

The key matchups in the opener will be at the 118 and 134 divisions. BU's Dennis King will meet Gardiner at 118 lbs. Both were state champs last year in high school. King is used to wrestling at a higher weight (130 lbs) and will have to come down. At the 134 lb. weight class Heitzman will meet BU's returning New England champion Mike Enzien.

"We have a tough schedule this year but we'll surprise some people" Freitas said. "These guys wrestle year round and with their talent could be as good as anybody."

UConn downs swimmers

By TOM SCOLLINS
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts women's swim team came up short last Friday night against the Connecticut Huskies but it wasn't a total disappointment. The women were beaten 86-53 but showed some definite potential in many events.

Of the 36 entries for the Minutewomen, 16 of those bettered their times from the seasons previous meets. In addition, 11 swimmers were entered in events they had never competed in before. Coach Valerie Turtle was pleased with her team's effort, "It was a decent meet for first time entries and drops (in time)."

UMass boasted two triple winners in the meet. Freshman Allison Uzzo Brockton, with victories in the 400 yard freestyle relay (with Lori McCluskey, Rosemary Kelsall, and Elizabeth Feinberg), the 500 yd. freestyle and a record setting effort in the 1000 yd. freestyle with a time of 11:15.17 was superb. She broke the two year old record in 1000 freestyle by over 4 seconds.

Junior Captain Elizabeth Feinberg was the other triple winner with wins in the freestyle relay, and the 100 and 200 yard freestyle races.

Jean Bushee was a double winner, winning the one meter and three meter diving competition. Caroline Freitas qualified for the New Englands with her effort in the 200 yard backstroke.

UMass is now 1-2 on the season, but Coach Turtle is optimistic. "We're trying some new events for people and they are trying to explore their potential," she said. "We set some meet goals, but we also want to set some individual goals and we have seen that in black and white."

UMass' next meet is with Springfield College November 30th at 6 p.m. in Boyden.

College basketball starts as NC defeats Houston,76-64

By DAN LEBERFELD
Collegian Staff

SPRINGFIELD — The 1983-84 college basketball season is officially underway as North Carolina State defeated the University of Houston 76-64 at the fifth annual Tipoff Classic last Saturday in the Springfield Civic Center.

A capacity crowd of 8,700 witnessed this rematch of last season's championship final where North Carolina State prevailed 54-52 on a Lorenzo Charles dunk off a Derrick Whittenburg air ball at the buzzer.

Charles was a relatively unknown before "the shot heard around the world." He was a player who started for the Wolfpack just to round out the starting five. He was an excellent player who could rebound with the best of them but, wasn't much of scoring threat.

Charles worked "his butt off" this summer according to Wolfpack coach Jim Valvano to improve his shooting. It paid off as the 6-7 junior from Brooklyn, New York shot 7 for 11 and scored 23 points, Saturday.

The now complete player Charles also pulled in 13 rebounds and blocked 2 shots. Believe it or not he wasn't the game MVP.

Spud Webb, a 5-6, 135 pound guard from Dallas, just stole the show and collected the MVP award.

This mighty-mite junior, a transfer from Midland Texas Junior college, had the crowd on it's feet. He possesses a deadly jump shot, lightning speed, an incredible 42 inch vertical leap, and tremendous court presence. He put this all together Saturday with a 18 point, 5 assist and 3 steal performance.

Last season Webb led Midland to the junior college national championship. Upon

UM hockey, soccer still came home winners

By GERRY deSIMAS
and ELLEN RICHARD

From the various and numerous notes from the NCAA Division I field hockey championships this weekend at Franklin Field in Philadelphia.....and the division I women's soccer championships from Orlando, Florida.....

The defense of the Old Dominion field hockey team was awesome as it shut down the offensive attacks of both Massachusetts in the semi's (outshooting UMass 22-3) and top ranked Connecticut (outshooting the Huskies 25-4). The Monarchs, winners from the second year in a row, placed four players on the All-Tourney team including Christy Morgan, who had two goals against UMass ("She's real dangerous," said UM's Pam Hixon.)

UM placed three players on the squad, UConn two and Northwestern two. Pam Moryl, Megan Donnelly, who had the tying goals in the ODU and NW games, and Patty Shea were named to the squad.

And Shea did play the Northwestern game with a small crack in her arm below the elbow. Nevertheless, the goalie was diving all over the field and made 19 saves against NW.

Another Minutewomen played hurt against NW. Fefender Nancy Goode, who took a ball to the head that required eight stiches, came in the second half to prop up the team.

"We tried not to play her," said Hixon. "You have to be careful with head injuries."

Goode played well though as she stopped one goal when Shea was out of the cage on a save.

"Nancy's been kind of a unsung hero," said Hixon. "She's been very steady for four years. She's always there at the right time (in reference to the save)."

"Chris Coughlin has played every position on the field," Hixon said. "She's been very steady and doesn't make a mistake that hurts you." Also, how many players have their sister on the team too?

In the consolation game against NW, ("They were pysched just to be there," said Hixon), it took a while to get untracked and after one overtime (it was agreed before to play only one OT in the consolation game due ESPN's tight schedule), it was strokes time.

"The same thing happened to us four years ago in Springfield and we came out with a loss," said Patti Smith, who scored the gamewinner. "I just wanted to be on the winning side." Smith was the last of five to shoot in the first strokeoff which ended tied at 1-1 and her shot hit the post.

The game was going to feature the University of Masssachusetts defense vs the University of North Carolina offense and it was going to be one tough match. The tough match turned into an even tougher one when the UMass defense dwindled to only three healthy defensemen - Mary Szetela, Beth Semonik and Kristi Kelly.

With Lori Stukes forced out of action because of sprained knee sustained in practice, the Minutewomen team began to feel the effects of playing with a small squad all year. The combination of losing Stukes, who was the only UMass defender to score this season (four goals), and the offensive explosiveness of the Tar Heels wore the team down faster.

Jeanne Paul was outstanding in the UMass goal and kept the team in the game when the minimalized defense ran into problems. Paul, a freshman who received her first loss of the season, finished the year with a 6-1-1 record while recording five shutouts. Paul and other freshman Michelle Rodney on defense received game balls for their play.

Despite losing to North Carolina, the Minutewomen regained their composure and came back the next day to get the next best thing to winning the Championship - defeating UConn.

One of the Minutewomen's top priorities this season was to prove that they are a respectable team. The 16 members of this team worked together and worked hard to go as far as they did and have no more proving to do as they played with the best teams and, injuries or not, showed their ability.

Genocide mourned on Common

By DAVID SUMMERSBY
Collegian Staff

Through letters and public mourning many people in Amherst are bringing attention to the darker and less well known side of the Thanksgiving holiday, involving acts of destruction against Native American Indians committed when the Pilgrams discovered America, including here in Amherst.

Last night on the Amherst Common about 60 people took part in a mourning ritual for acts of genocide happening today around the world to reflect on the genocide of the past when this country was founded.

Kim Erslev, a graduate student at the University of Massachusetts, said Amherst was a site of genocide in 1763 when General Jeffery Amherst, who the town is named after, supposedly created a huge epidemic of small pox among the Indians by giving them infested blankets.

"He deliberately killed the native populations of Western Massachusetts in 1763," said Erslev, a member of an eight person feminist affinity group who organized the ritual.

Another woman from the group said the main point of the ritual was to make people aware that Thanksgiving is not just a celebration for the country's democracy and freedom but also a time for mourning.

"We can't forget that the freedom people are celebrating was won off the backs and blood of the Indian Natives," she said.

To raise public awareness of the genocide in Amherst, the affinity group has sent letters to 71 Amherst businesses and organizations describing the events.

"We are letting them know about the activities of Lord Jeffery Amherst so they can make a choice whether to keep a name for someone responsible for acts of genocide," said another member.

The ritual included the singing of songs, chants to drum beats, kneeling to the earth and many people held candles.

One chant, of the Hebrew phrase meaning "and the spirit shall heal it" was recited dozens of times after people called out current and past issues of distress to them such as poverty, racism and the United States presence in El Salvador.

Other chants were a common Indian Medicine women chant and one for peace orated by several Buddhist Monks from the order of Nipponzan.

An Indian woman from New Mexico attended the beginning of the ritual but then left after criticizing participants for only mourning Indians of the past and ignoring the needs of living Indians who the woman said are still being neglected.

"If you are really sincere about Indian issues then familiarize yourself with what is happening today on the reservations," said the Native American woman named Fire.

"The native American circle of life is much larger than people realize. You must know more about our people to talk about us. We were here when the invaders came, we are here now and always will be," she said.

One participant of the ritual said the Indian woman's opinion was quite valid.

"People talk about the Indians as if they are not here anymore. This must be changed," said Kathy from Northampton who refused to give her last name.

Several students from UMass attended the ritual and one said he felt very strongly about the issues being addressed.

"I came because I feel the United States has taken a historical role in destroying people of other lands and nations everywhere," said junior Court Cline.

The Thanksgiving holiday in Massachusetts:

Indians are giving no thanks

By VIRGINIA WARFIELD
Collegian Correspondent

Thanksgiving traditionally symbolizes the gratitude and good fortune of the Pilgrims,but the holiday has a different meaning for the other Massachusetts inhabitants of 1620.

According to Umass associate professor of anthropology Dena Dincauze, American Indians feel a bitterness that surfaces everyl Thanksgiving.

She said the holiday "has become a sort of counter-culture image for Indian self-awareness. It undermines their Indianness and reminds them how they have suffered."

Though once prevalent in New England, Dincauze said Indians today as far west as the Dakotas are beginning to stress Thanksgiving as a symbol of the tragedy on their part.

She added the issue is becoming an important one to Indian students and culture here on campus.

During the mid-17th century, Dincauze said, large populations of Indians inhabited Hadley, Northampton, and Deerfield.

These native American people in New England, who belonged to no specific tribes but were named according to where they lived, were part of a culture already 10,000 years old when the pilgrims arrived at Plymouth.

As hunters and farmers, the Indians here—the Nontucks or Nowottucks— were centered around major areas of fertile soil, she said, until 1675, when they were driven out of the valley during battles of the King Phillip's War.

After withdrawing to Connecticut, they came back in 1704 and raided Deerfield. "Deerfield has been riding on the fame ever since," she said.

Though war and disease destroyed a great part of the Indian population, many native people survive today in New England, and much of their culture and craft is preserved.

Governor sends Fire Marshall to solve problem

By PAUL BASKEN

Even as two Crampton Dormitory residents made final plans yesterday to move from their arson-plagued building in the Southwest Residential Area, the twelfth and thirteenth fires there forced residents to evacuate twice more.

Students were evacuated after an alarm was pulled at 7:30 last night, and were forced to wait more than two hours outside as police questioned all residents returning into the building.

Sarah Pike, a second-floor Crampton resident, who was waiting outside the dormitory last night said toilet paper rolls were set on fire in a third floor bathroom, and University of Massachusetts police "want to know if anyone has seen anyone suspicious."

"It's an inconvenience, to say the least," Pike said of the evacuation. "We have exams and papers due tomorrow, and professors aren't impressed by the fact that we had a fire alarm."

A second floor bulletin board was discovered on fire early yesterday at 12:37 a.m., and during the day, spurred by the concern of Gov. Michael S. Dukakis, the state Fire Marshall visited the campus to meet with University and local officials to determine a solution to the problem.

"We're too scared to live here anymore," said freshman communications studies major Kristin Peterson of Abington, describing why she and a friend will not be living in Crampton after Thanksgiving break.

Freshman Kimberly Stoll said she and Peterson spent Monday night at Stoll's parents' home in Agawam.

State Fire Marshall Joseph A. O'Keefe came here from Boston yesterday to meet with officials including University Police Chief Robert Joyce and State Police trooper Jay Bowman.

"I'm out here to help them in whatever is necessary to resolve these problems," said O'Keefe.

He said Dukakis had received phone calls from parents of residents and has himself become "concerned" about the arson plague which has included more than 20 suspicious fires in four of five residence areas this semester. Although all have been quickly extinguished before causing serious damage and injury, O'Keefe stressed it is a serious crime and is being treated as such.

But despite such admonitions to take the incidents seriously, and assurances of a full investigation by police, some Crampton residents aren't impressed.

"It doesn't bother me at all," said Jean Carroll, a freshman political science major from Newburyport. Concurring with other residents questioned yesterday, Carroll said she felt more than one person is responsible, and that "I don't think the police are doing enough, but I don't know what they are doing because they don't tell us."

"They say they're doing everything they can, but if they were, they would have someone by now," agreed sophomore Moira Fitzgerald of Springfield. "I wish they'd catch the person."

Although Carroll said she is printing up a sweatshirt declaring Crampton "the hottest place to be at UMass," she said "a lot of people are saying 'there's no way I'm living there next semester.'"

However, Gerald Quarles, assignment coordinator for Housing Services, said only six Crampton residents indicated a desire to relocate during the room choosing process for next semester. He admitted, though, that any such movement is rare in the all female dormitory, which he said is normally "a very popular place."

Director of Housing Services Joseph Zannini said 24-hour security will remain on in Crampton and in Cashin Dormitory in the Sylvan Residential Area, the site of eight suspicious fires this semester.

Schmidt launches paper Pershing

BONN, West Germany (AP) — Former Chancellor Helmut Schmidt flew a paper airplane in the main chamber of the West German Parliament on Tuesday while his longtime party rival, Willy Brandt, was making an anti-missile speech.

Schmidt began folding the airplane as Brandt attacked supporters of a new NATO missile deployment in West Germany. Then, to the amusement of deputies nearby, Schmidt launched his missile-like paper construction. Witnesses said he had written "Pershing 2" on the wings.

Schmidt, Social Democratic chancellor from 1974 to 1982, was an originator of the 1979 NATO decision to deploy 572 new U.S.-built nuclear missiles in Western Europe starting in 1983 if the superpowers failed to reach an arms control agreement first.

The left-leaning Brandt, also a former chancellor and rival of the more conservative Schmidt, is credited with having turned the Social Democrats away from the NATO missile deployment. The party voted last weekend to reject the missiles.

PLO rebels give Arafat three days

TRIPOLI, Lebanon (AP) — Syrian-supported Palestinian rebels shattered a self-imposed truce Tuesday, shelled buildings around Yasser Arafat's offices and gave the PLO leader 72 hours to get out of the embattled city alive. Police said at least 30 people were killed.

"If he does not go from Tripoli, we will attack him in the streets," said Ahmed Jibril, who leads one of the groups fighting the Palestine Liberation Organization chairman. Asked how long Arafat had to flee the city, Jibril told reporters:"This situtation will continue for only three days."

In Washington, Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger said the suicide truck-bomb attack on U.S. Marines in Beirut last month was carried out with "the sponsorship, knowledge and authority of the Syrian government."

The bomb killed 239 American servicemen. President Reagan has publicly promised that the attackers would be punished, but Weinberger refused to discuss any retaliation.

Jaruzelski tightens political grip

WARSAW, Poland (AP) — Premier Gen. Wojciech Jaruzelski on Monday took control of a new defense council that gives him many of the sweeping powers he enjoyed during 19 months of martial law.

Parliament installed the Polish leader as chairman of the council and named him supreme commander in chief of the armed forces after he formally resigned as defense minister, a post he held for 15 years.

It also approved his proposal to shuffle the economic ministers in his Cabinet to "make the government work more effectively."

Jaruzelski retains the jobs of premier and first secretary of the ruling Communist Party.

The changes strengthen the 60-year-old general's grip on power and guarantee a prominent role for the military in Poland.

JFK mourned in televised Mass

WASHINGTON (AP) — In the church where John F. Kennedy once worshiped, his family and aging heirs of the New Frontier gathered Tuesday on the 20th anniversary of his death.

With President Reagan sitting on the front row in Holy Trinity Roman Catholic Church, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., and Archbishop James A. Hickey of Washington took the occasion of a nationally televised memorial Mass to appeal for renewed efforts to achieve racial justice and end the nuclear arms race.

Senator Kennedy summed up his brother in these words:

"He was a hero of war who fought hardest for peace.

"He said and proved in word and deed that one man can make a difference, which is why his thousand days will be remembered for a thousand years and more."

"As the torch is passed to each succeeding generation," the senator concluded, "I believe that those who seek peace and justice, those who join the forward march of the human pilgrimage on earth, will say of John Fitzgerald Kennedy, 'He has never left us, and he never will'."

Draft resister sent to jail for 6 months

BOSTON (AP) — A draft resister who refused to perform court-ordered volunteer work was dragged away by federal marshals Tuesday after being sentenced to six months in prison for violating terms of his parole.

Edward J. Hasbrouck, 23, of Wellesley, collapsed to the floor when U.S. District Judge David S. Nelson said he was revoking his parole and ordering him to prison.

"When you first came before me I believed you, but I don't believe you anymore," Nelson said. "You lied when you said you'd perform public service and you're lying now."

Nelson ordered Hasbrouck taken to prison "not next week and not tomorrow but right now, this minute."

"I can't conceive of any reason why people are willing to express support for our suicidal military policy," said Hasbrouck.

Hasbrouck was sentenced to six months in jail in January for failing to register for the draft. However, Nelson suspended the sentence and ordered Hasbrouck to perform 1,000 hours of public service.

"Although you have clearly and absolutely acted in defiance of the law, you acted out of conscience," Nelson said Jan. 14 when he suspended the sentence.

Hasbrouck was found innocent July 19 of charges he assaulted a U.S. marshal at a court hearing in Cambridge during a scuffle that broke out after protestors plastered anti-draft stickers in a courtroom.

Financial compensation proposed for victims of toxic waste exposure

WOBURN, Mass. (AP) — Families victimized by chemical waste spills endorsed a plan Tuesday for the federal government to pay for medical treatment for people exposed to toxic substances.

Witnesses told the U.S. House Energy and Commerce Committee that current laws covering the cleanup of dump sites do nothing to pay for the medical coverage of people whose illnesses are linked to contaminated areas.

"For the want of some benefits or financial resources, some lives and some families have been lost," said the Rev. Bruce Young, pastor of Trinity Church in Woburn. He urged the legislators to amend a proposed victims compensation bill and include psychiatric counseling to help families cope with medical problems.

Young has counseled many families that blame the city's sprawling Industriplex dump — one of the 10 worst hazardous waste spots in the country — for medical problems, including one of the highest cancer rates in the state.

The congressional field hearing, chaired by U.S. Rep. Edward Markey, D-Mass., was held at a hotel located several hundred yards away from the dump, which contains acres of chemical-soaked earth and pools of poisonous arsenic.

Ann Anderson of Woburn testified that her son Jimmy died in January 1981 due to drinking water that had been contaminated by the dump. Jimmy, one of many local children who contracted leukemia, battled the disease from age 3 until his death at age 12.

"I will say that every aspect of our lives have changed for the worse," said Mrs. Anderson. She urged the panel to expand the bill and make it retroactive to cover people like her son who have already died.

The sweeping compensation bill, sponsored by Markey, would cover medical costs — including surgery, hospitalization, nursing care, ambulances, drugs, rehabilitation and other services — which are incurred in connection with a physical injury or illness connected to hazardous waste exposure.

Since scientists can rarely establish a cause-and-effect relationship between chemical exposure and illness, a victim would be allowed to establish the link simply through "a preponderance of the evidence."

Dukakis okays 13-hour voting day

BOSTON (AP) — A new law extending voting hours in Massachusetts will make the voting process more accessible to residents, Gov. Michael S. Dukakis said Monday.

Under a law passed after an 11-year legislative battle, the polls must now be open 13 hours for all state elections. Previously, the law set a minimum of 10 hours, although most larger communities stayed open 12 hours, from 8 a.m. to 8 p.m., with a few opening even earlier.

Under the bill Dukakis signed into law last week, the mandatory closing hour remains 8 p.m., but requires an earlier opening.

Police lace up another theft case

PROVIDENCE, R.I. (AP) — Four youths broke into a shoelace company, stole 28,000 colorful sneaker laces then sold about half of them in school before getting caught, police said Tuesday.

Detective Cyril Rourke said four boys forced opened the rear door of the Lincoln Lace & Braid Co. Sunday and made off with 14,000 pairs of laces valued at $16,000. They have been charged with breaking and entering and referred to Family Court.

When Rourke went to the boys' homes, all at the same housing project, he said he found "closets full of these laces — I mean literally closets full and bags full of laces."

Detectives spent most of their investigation at the Oliver Hazard Middle School, where "just about everybody had a pair of the things," Rourke said.

Ceremony remembers JFK death

By ANNE McCRORY
and DAVID B. MINER
Collegian Staff

John F. Kennedy dormitory at the University of Massachusetts Tuesday hosted state and University officials in a ceremony commemorating the former President on the 20th anniversary of his death.

The hour long ceremony, which concluded with the unveiling of a Kennedy portrait donated by the John F. Kennedy Library in Boston, featured speakers who praised Kennedy's dedication to education and reflected upon his time in power.

"Because of President Kennedy, I believe that education is the key to everything," said Resident Director Sam Hanger in opening the ceremony. "It is through education that we combat those things that hurt society. Even though 20 years have passed, it is particularly fitting to single out President Kennedy as a sincere and gifted Pied Piper of social reform."

"We feel that the recognition of the man after whom this tower is named, and the commemoration of what his past achievements and contributions to our society have meant, exemplifies the mood which now presides on this campus as a whole, and specifically within the JFK residence hall," dormitory Treasurer Todd Treacy said in his remarks.

Treacy said in an interview that the dorm is working to change its image from a residence with reputedly bad physical conditions and lack of activities to "one where a positive attitude exists."

Peter Themistocles, dorm vice president, said the idea to commemorate Kennedy's anniversary came about a month ago.

"We wanted to do something—we're the only dorm for Kennedy on campus, and we wanted to gain recognition throughout campus as one of the better places to live at UMass," he said.

Themistocles said he thought Kennedy would be "proud" to have the dorm named after him from "the general level of enthusiasm in the dorm and in Southwest."

"It's ironic," he added, "that three quarters of the people here were not even born when he (Kennedy) was president, but they still appreciate what he did and what is going on."

Three members of the Reserve Officer Training Corps color guard were also on hand to commemorate the late President, saluting with rifles as student John Powers trumpeted Taps at the ceremony's closing. A moment of silence was also observed in Kennedy's memory.

Speakers offering their recollections of the slain leader included Kennedy associate and family friend Sebastian J. Ruggeri of Greenfield, William Courier of Gov. Michael S. Dukakis' Western Massachusetts office, administrative representative Bonnie Strickland and Joseph Hernon, a UMass history professor who plans to teach a course on Kennedy next semester.

JFK dormitory, located in the Southwest Residential Area, is one of four towers named after former presidents raised in Massachusetts.

SGA's US government certificates come due

SATF money to be reinvested

By JOHN O'CONNELL
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association (SGA) coordinating committee recently authorized reinvestment of $150,000 in Student Activities Trust Fund monies.

The SGA has invested the money, which represents a portion of unused cash in the SATF account, for the past two years under the SGA Investment Policy, SGA Treasurer Eric Nitzsche said.

The SATF includes all accounts and transactions of all Registered Student Organizations (RSOs) including the SGA at the University of Massachusetts, plus $962,000 cash on hand, which the groups have not used yet, Nitzsche said.

The $150,000 is invested in U.S. Government Certificates of Deposit, and interest on the certificates is placed into two accounts, "to replace capital equipment that breaks down and to buy equipment needed for unusual contingencies," he said.

The $150,000 principle is not allocatable, Nitzsche said, and any increase in the investment must be approved by the Coordinating Committee, the Student Activities Office Business manager, and the Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs.

The SGA invests "what we feel is a safe amount," Nitzsche said, "but I think we could probably afford more in there."

The interest income "depends on the going rate," he said. "Last year, since the interest rate was about 10 percent on this bond, we made $15,000," and "this year, the interest rate will probably be lower, so we will make about $10,000," he added.

Nitzsche said the SGA might be able to make more money by investing in private companies instead of government bonds, but added that "we're a state trust fund. We can't just go out and buy all kinds of securities."

The SATF, paid for by the $96 yearly Student Activities Fee and totaling almost $2 million in revenue, is one of many trust funds in the three-campus university system. Reserve money from these trust funds is invested by the University treasurer, and the interest from these investments is redistributed by University President David C. Knapp.

This policy "is fine when you are dealing with state monies," Nitzsche said, but student groups "work hard to raise a few thousand dollars" for activities, and the SGA Investment Policy was set up "to help make up for the fact that we don't get any interest."

Apple II computers stolen from lab

University of Massachusetts police reported three thefts yesterday.

Two Apple II computers, valued between $5,000 and $6,000, were reported stolen from the second floor in Chenoweth laboratory between 4 p.m. Sunday and 8 a.m. Monday, police said. Chenoweth houses the Food Science and Nutrition program on campus.

A necklace valued at $180 was reported stolen from an unlocked room on the second floor of Moore dormitory, police said. The necklace was taken between 4 p.m. Saturday and 12:30 Sunday, according to the report.

A leather jacket and wallet, valued at $135, were taken from the Blue Wall in the Campus Center between 9 p.m. and 10:30 p.m. on Friday, Nov. 18, police said. There are no suspects.

Commission will review ethics code, faculty civility

By LIZ TURNER
Collegian Correspondent

Upon request from the Chancellor's Staff, the Chancellor's Commission on Civility will review the Code of Professional Ethics for the Faculty at the University of Massachusetts and their own review of faculty involvement in civility.

The review, tentatively set for early December, will involve members from the Civility Commission and Faculty Senate—and presumably members of the Personnell Policies Committee, a standing committee of the Faculty Senate, according to Senate Secretary Bob Jones.

Vincent Dethier, Civility Commission chair, explained the two reviews. The first, he said, will be "to see if the code is adequate, if it addresses certain issues, and how well it operates." The second review, the commission's was motivated by the results of two reports and "the Commission's perception that the faculty did not assume an outstandingly active role in matters concerning civility," Dethier said.

The Evaluation of the Year in Civility, completed in August of 1982, "did not indicate widespread faculty participation in general," Dethier said. In the second report, compiled by the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA), "students have raised questions about the rights of students vis-a-vis faculty and professional staff," Dethier said.

The present code of ethics outlines aspects of teaching such as, "to seek and state the truth, to encourage the free pursuit of learning in the student, and the obligations that derive from common membership in the community of scholars."

The first code, drafted by the Academic Personnel Policies Committee on February 9, 1978, was a "modification and adaptation" of a similar code drawn up by the American Association of University Professors, Jones said. In May 1980, an amendment was added to that code which requires faculty to exercise equality with respect to the rights of others, in evaluation of peers and students and assignments of duties in the University, and to "promote the ideals of a learning environment that fosters individual rights and encourages mutual respect."

When asked his feelings concerning the present code, Professor of English William O'Donnell said, "Maybe the code is not clear enough. There are specific problems, such as giving grades and letters of recommendation, where the code would be of more help if it were specific." The present code, O'Donnell said, "ought to be read very carefully."

Schmidt launches paper Pershing

BONN, West Germany (AP) — Former Chancellor Helmut Schmidt flew a paper airplane in the main chamber of the West German Parliament on Tuesday while his longtime party rival, Willy Brandt, was making an anti-missile speech.

Schmidt began folding the airplane as Brandt attacked supporters of a new NATO missile deployment in West Germany. Then, to the amusement of deputies nearby, Schmidt launched his missile-like paper construction. Witnesses said he had written "Pershing 2" on the wings.

Schmidt, Social Democratic chancellor from 1974 to 1982, was an originator of the 1979 NATO decision to deploy 572 new U.S.-built nuclear missiles in Western Europe starting in 1983 if the superpowers failed to reach an arms control agreement first.

The left-leaning Brandt, also a former chancellor and rival of the more conservative Schmidt, is credited with having turned the Social Democrats away from the NATO missile deployment. The party voted last weekend to reject the missiles.

PLO rebels give Arafat three days

TRIPOLI, Lebanon (AP) — Syrian-supported Palestinian rebels shattered a self-imposed truce Tuesday, shelled buildings around Yasser Arafat's offices and gave the PLO leader 72 hours to get out of the embattled city alive. Police said at least 30 people were killed.

"If he does not go from Tripoli, we will attack him in the streets," said Ahmed Jibril, who leads one of the groups fighting the Palestine Liberation Organization chairman. Asked how long Arafat had to flee the city, Jibril told reporters: "This situtation will continue for only three days."

In Washington, Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger said the suicide truck-bomb attack on U.S. Marines in Beirut last month was carried out with "the sponsorship, knowledge and authority of the Syrian government."

The bomb killed 239 American servicemen. President Reagan has publicly promised that the attackers would be punished, but Weinberger refused to discuss any retaliation.

Jaruzelski tightens political grip

WARSAW, Poland (AP) — Premier Gen. Wojciech Jaruzelski on Monday took control of a new defense council that gives him many of the sweeping powers he enjoyed during 19 months of martial law.

Parliament installed the Polish leader as chairman of the council and named him supreme commander in chief of the armed forces after he formally resigned as defense minister, a post he held for 15 years.

It also approved his proposal to shuffle the economic ministers in his Cabinet to "make the government work more effectively."

Jaruzelski retains the jobs of premier and first secretary of the ruling Communist Party.

The changes strengthen the 60-year-old general's grip on power and guarantee a prominent role for the military in Poland.

JFK mourned in televised Mass

WASHINGTON (AP) — In the church where John F. Kennedy once worshiped, his family and aging heirs of the New Frontier gathered Tuesday on the 20th anniversary of his death.

With President Reagan sitting on the front row in Holy Trinity Roman Catholic Church, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., and Archbishop James A. Hickey of Washington took the occasion of a nationally televised memorial Mass to appeal for renewed efforts to achieve racial justice and end the nuclear arms race.

Senator Kennedy summed up his brother in these words:

"He was a hero of war who fought hardest for peace.

"He said and proved in word and deed that one man can make a difference, which is why his thousand days will be remembered for a thousand years and more."

"As the torch is passed to each succeeding generation," the senator concluded, "I believe that those who seek peace and justice, those who join the forward march of the human pilgrimage on earth, will say of John Fitzgerald Kennedy, 'He has never left us, and he never will'."

Draft resister sent to jail for 6 months

BOSTON (AP) — A draft resister who refused to perform court-ordered volunteer work was dragged away by federal marshals Tuesday after being sentenced to six months in prison for violating terms of his parole.

Edward J. Hasbrouck, 23, of Wellesley, collapsed to the floor when U.S. District Judge David S. Nelson said he was revoking his parole and ordering him to prison.

"When you first came before me I believed you, but I don't believe you anymore," Nelson said. "You lied when you said you'd perform public service and you're lying now."

Nelson ordered Hasbrouck taken to prison "not next week and not tomorrow but right now, this minute."

"I can't conceive of any reason why people are willing to express support for our suicidal military policy," said Hasbrouck.

Hasbrouck was sentenced to six months in jail in January for failing to register for the draft. However, Nelson suspended the sentence and ordered Hasbrouck to perform 1,000 hours of public service.

"Although you have clearly and absolutely acted in defiance of the law, you acted out of conscience," Nelson said Jan. 14 when he suspended the sentence.

Hasbrouck was found innocent July 19 of charges he assaulted a U.S. marshal at a court hearing in Cambridge during a scuffle that broke out after protestors plastered anti-draft stickers in a courtroom.

Financial compensation proposed for victims of toxic waste exposure

WOBURN, Mass. (AP) — Families victimized by chemical waste spills endorsed a plan Tuesday for the federal government to pay for medical treatment for people exposed to toxic substances.

Witnesses told the U.S. House Energy and Commerce Committee that current laws covering the cleanup of dump sites do nothing to pay for the medical coverage of people whose illnesses are linked to contaminated areas.

"For the want of some benefits or financial resources, some lives and some families have been lost," said the Rev. Bruce Young, pastor of Trinity Church in Woburn. He urged the legislators to amend a proposed victims compensation bill and include psychiatric counseling to help families cope with medical problems.

Young has counseled many families that blame the city's sprawling Industriplex dump — one of the 10 worst hazardous waste spots in the country — for medical problems, including one of the highest cancer rates in the state.

The congressional field hearing, chaired by U.S. Rep. Edward Markey, D-Mass., was held at a hotel located several hundred yards away from the dump, which contains acres of chemical-soaked earth and pools of poisonous arsenic.

Ann Anderson of Woburn testified that her son Jimmy died in January 1981 due to drinking water that had been contaminated by the dump. Jimmy, one of many local children who contracted leukemia, battled the disease from age 3 until his death at age 12.

"I will say that every aspect of our lives have changed for the worse," said Mrs. Anderson. She urged the panel to expand the bill and make it retroactive to cover people like her son who have already died.

The sweeping compensation bill, sponsored by Markey, would cover medical costs — including surgery, hospitalization, nursing care, ambulances, drugs, rehablitation and other services — which are incurred in connection with a physical injury or illness connected to hazardous waste exposure.

Since scientists can rarely establish a cause-and-effect relationship between chemical exposure and illness, a victim would be allowed to establish the link simply through "a preponderance of the evidence."

Dukakis okays 13-hour voting day

BOSTON (AP) — A new law extending voting hours in Massachusetts will make the voting process more accessible to residents, Gov. Michael S. Dukakis said Monday.

Under a law passed after an 11-year legislative battle, the polls must now be open 13 hours for all state elections.

Previously, the law set a minimum of 10 hours, although most larger communities stayed open 12 hours, from 8 a.m. to 8 p.m., with a few opening even earlier.

Under the bill Dukakis signed into law last week, the mandatory closing hour remains 8 p.m., but requires an earlier opening.

Police lace up another theft case

PROVIDENCE, R.I. (AP) — Four youths broke into a shoelace company, stole 28,000 colorful sneaker laces then sold about half of them in school before getting caught, police said Tuesday.

Detective Cyril Rourke said four boys forced opened the rear door of the Lincoln Lace & Braid Co. Sunday and made off with 14,000 pairs of laces valued at $16,000. They have been charged with breaking and entering and referred to Family Court.

When Rourke went to the boys' homes, all at the same housing project, he said he found "closets full of these laces — I mean literally closets full and bags full of laces."

Detectives spent most of their investigation at the Oliver Hazard Middle School, where "just about everybody had a pair of the things," Rourke said.

Ceremony remembers JFK death

By ANNE McCRORY
and DAVID B. MINER
Collegian Staff

John F. Kennedy dormitory at the University of Massachusetts Tuesday hosted state and University officials in a ceremony commemorating the former President on the 20th anniversary of his death.

The hour long ceremony, which concluded with the unveiling of a Kennedy portrait donated by the John F. Kennedy Library in Boston, featured speakers who praised Kennedy's dedication to education and reflected upon his time in power.

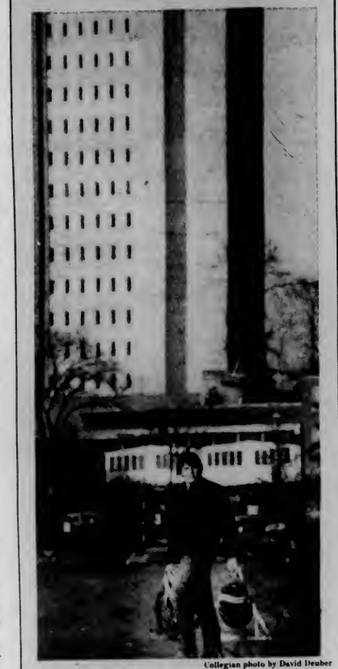
"Because of President Kennedy, I believe that education is the key to everything," said Resident Director Sam Hanger in opening the ceremony. "It is through education that we combat those things that hurt society. Even though 20 years have passed, it is particularly fitting to single out President Kennedy as a sincere and gifted Pied Piper of social reform."

"We feel that the recognition of the man after whom this tower is named, and the commemoration of what his past achievements and contributions to our society have meant, exemplifies the mood which now presides on this campus as a whole, and specifically within the JFK residence hall," dormitory Treasurer Todd Treacy said in his remarks.

Treacy said in an interview that the dorm is working to change its image from a residence with reputedly bad physical conditions and lack of activities to "one where a positive attitude exists."

Peter Themistocles, dorm vice president, said the idea to commemorate Kennedy's anniversary came about a month ago.

"We wanted to do something—we're the only dorm for Kennedy on campus, and we wanted to gain recognition throughout campus as one of the better places to live at UMass," he said.



Themistocles said he thought Kennedy would be "proud" to have the dorm named after him from "the general level of enthusiasm in the dorm and in Southwest."

"It's ironic," he added, "that three quarters of the people here were not even born when he (Kennedy) was president, but they still appreciate what he did and what is going on."

Three members of the Reserve Officer Training Corps color guard were also on hand to commemorate the late President, saluting with rifles as student John Powers trumpeted Taps at the ceremony's closing. A moment of silence was also observed in Kennedy's memory.

Speakers offering their recollections of the slain leader included Kennedy associate and family friend Sebastian J. Ruggeri of Greenfield, William Courier of Gov. Michael S. Dukakis' Western Massachusetts office, administrative representative Bonnie Strickland and Joseph Hernon, a UMass history professor who plans to teach a course on Kennedy next semester.

JFK dormitory, located in the Southwest Residential Area, is one of four towers named after former presidents raised in Massachusetts.

SGA's US government certificates come due

SATF money to be reinvested

By JOHN O'CONNELL
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association (SGA) coordinating committee recently authorized reinvestment of $150,000 in Student Activities Trust Fund monies.

The SGA has invested the money, which represents a portion of unused cash in the SATF account, for the past two years under the SGA Investment Policy, SGA Treasurer Eric Nitzsche said.

The SATF includes all accounts and transactions of all Registered Student Organizations (RSOs) including the SGA at the University of Massachusetts, plus $962,000 cash on hand, which the groups have not used yet, Nitzsche said.

The $150,000 is invested in U.S. Government Certificates of Deposit, and interest on the certificates is placed into two accounts, "to replace capital equipment that breaks down and to buy equipment needed for unusual contingencies," he said.

The $150,000 principle is not allocatable, Nitzsche said, and any increase in the investment must be approved by the Coordinating Committee, the Student Activities Office Business manager, and the Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs.

The SGA invests "what we feel is a safe amount," Nitzsche said, "but I think we could probably afford more in there."

The interest income "depends on the going rate," he said. "Last year, since the interest rate was about 10 percent on this bond, we made $15,000," and "this year, the interest rate will probably be lower, so we will make about $10,000," he added.

Nitzsche said the SGA might be able to make more money by investing in private companies instead of government bonds, but added that "we're a state trust fund. We can't just go out and buy all kinds of securities."

The SATF, paid for by the $96 yearly Student Activities Fee and totaling almost $2 million in revenue, is one of many trust funds in the three-campus university system. Reserve money from these trust funds is invested by the University treasurer, and the interest from these investments is redistributed by University President David C. Knapp.

This policy "is fine when you are dealing with state monies," Nitzsche said, but student groups "work hard to raise a few thousand dollars" for activities, and the SGA Investment Policy was set up "to help make up for the fact that we don't get any interest."

Apple II computers stolen from lab

University of Massachusetts police reported three thefts yesterday.

Two Apple II computers, valued between $5,000 and $6,000, were reported stolen from the second floor in Chenoweth laboratory between 4 p.m. Sunday and 8 a.m. Monday, police said. Chenoweth houses the Food Science and Nutrition program on campus.

A necklace valued at $180 was reported stolen from an unlocked room on the second floor of Moore dormitory, police said. The necklace was taken between 4 p.m. Saturday and 12:30 Sunday, according to the report.

A leather jacket and wallet, valued at $135, were taken from the Blue Wall in the Campus Center between 9 p.m. and 10:30 p.m. on Friday, Nov. 18, police said. There are no suspects.

Commission will review ethics code, faculty civility

By LIZ TURNER
Collegian Correspondent

Upon request from the Chancellor's Staff, the Chancellor's Commission on Civility will review the Code of Professional Ethics for the Faculty at the University of Massachusetts and their own review of faculty involvement in civility.

The review, tentatively set for early December, will involve members from the Civility Commission and Faculty Senate—and presumably members of the Personnell Policies Committee, a standing committee of the Faculty Senate, according to Senate Secretary Bob Jones.

Vincent Dethier, Civility Commission chair, explained the two reviews. The first, he said, will be "to see if the code is adequate, if it addresses certain issues, and how well it operates." The second review, the commission's was motivated by the results of two reports and "the Commission's perception that the faculty did not assume an outstandingly active role in matters concerning civility," Dethier said.

The Evaluation of the Year in Civility, completed in August of 1982, "did not indicate widespread faculty participation in general," Dethier said. In the second report, compiled by the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA), "students have raised questions about the rights of students vis-a-vis faculty and professional staff," Dethier said.

The present code of ethics outlines aspects of teaching such as, "to seek and state the truth, to encourage the free pursuit of learning in the student, and the obligations that derive from common membership in the community of scholars."

The first code, drafted by the Academic Personnel Policies Committee on February 9, 1978, was a "modification and adaptation" of a similar code drawn up by the American Association of University Professors, Jones said. In May 1980, an amendment was added to that code which requires faculty to exercise equality with respect to the rights of others, in evaluation of peers and students and assignments of duties in the University, and to "promote the ideals of a learning environment that fosters individual rights and encourages mutual respect."

When asked his feelings concerning the present code, Professor of English William O'Donnell said, "Maybe the code is not clear enough. There are specific problems, such as giving grades and letters of recommendation, where the code would be of more help if it were specific." The present code, O'Donnell said, "ought to be read very carefully."

Job placement manual can help hone job search skills

By THOMAS PITONIACK
Collegian Correspondent

For University of Massachusetts students who want to improve job search skills and learn more about the employment search and placement process, the free '83 Placement Manual is now available from the University Placement Service in Hampshire House.

The Fall '83 manual provides specific information about careers and placement—information that can be referred to after graduation as well as now. For example, the "Hints to Help You Write an Effective Resume" would be a useful tool for rewriting a resume in later years.

"It is another step in providing services for our students," said Arthur Hilson, director of University Placement Services, "and it is designed to prepare students entering the world of work."

The Placement Service has detailed instructions for completing a Job-Employee-Matching System (JEMS) form, and initiating a credential file, two of the first steps in establishing a partnership with the University Placement Service.

Also included in the manual is a thorough section on interviews, with general tips and lists such as the "Fifty Questions Most Often Asked by Employers During the Interview With College Seniors" and "Negative Factors Evaluated During an Employment Interview Frequently Leading to Rejection of the Applicant."

Another section of the manual is "Principles and Practices of College Career Planning, Placement, and Recruitment." It is a set of "basic agreements" which gives all parties in placement and recruitment a common code of ethics and acceptance of respective responsibilities.

The manual can help future graduates make a self-evaluation. The challenge of deciding on a career objective and preparing a resume requires a self-evaluation in regards to one's goals and aspirations.

Admissions tightens loophole

By SHEILA DONAHUE
Collegian Correspondent

A Population of "not more than 10" University of Massachusetss transfer students have attempted to conceal previous poor college--a small number, perhaps, but one reason the Admissions Office has changed its application, according to staff there.

Office of Transfer Affairs Director Kathy Ryan said there is now one application for both freshmen and transfer students--there used to be two--"strictly for processing reasons, for expediency." But that application now includes the disclaimer: "Failure to disclose previous college or university attendence may result in denial of admission and/or refusal to transfer credit to the University of Massachusetts record."

"It is normally a transfer student who tries to hide his records," Ryan said, "and transfers have to be screened a little more carefully. The way we find out generally, after the student is admitted, is that he wants credit for a flunked course. They just honestly think if they flunk out it's okay(to get credit)."

The problem is corrected by talking about it with a staff member and "generally, the students are cooperative," Ryan said.

The new application also gives "more specific" information about certain requirements on restricted programs, Ryan said, noting some departments are now more selective about whom they admit to certain majors because of the demand for restricted programs.

The new application also does not require not require the signature of a notary public, and is now included in the University Viewbook, a magazine-style publication issued in the Admissions Office to acquaint prospective students with the school.

CLOSED -- Hangar One is closed for financial reasons but it may reopen under new management.

Hangar One down ... but not out yet

By ANNE McCRORY
Collegian Staff

Local nightclub Hangar One Inc. cancelled scheduled acts and abruptly closed its doors late last week for financial reasons, according to the club's manager.

Michael Densmore, manager of the Route 9 nightspot distinguished by its rooftop airplane decoration, said the closing was effective immediately, though the club was "doing absolutely fine" businesswise.

Densmore said the Hangar could reopen shortly, more than likely under different management.

The case is currently "under assignment for the benefit of creditors," which is one step away from bankruptcy, according to Legal Services Office attorney Michael Pill.

Attorney Eugene B. Berman of Springfield, who is working on the case, said he is in the process of negotiating the club's debt, noting there are "a lot of creditors" to be paid. Berman said he was uncertain when creditors would get their money, but said he anticipates "no unsolvable problems."

"The structure of the club required that it be closed," Berman said. "They were encountering financial difficulties such that restructuring was required."

Hangar One Inc., which featured live bands, dormitory parties and semi-formals, was one of two area bars open to patrons under the legal drinking age.

Police protect Amherst College student

An Amherst College student is under police protection today after he was allegedly abducted Sunday by two armed men from his dorm room.

Amherst Police reported Monday that a 19-year-old man was confronted in his room by two men, one with a gun and the other carrying a knife, Sunday at about 11 a.m. The men allegedly threatened the student, then kidnapped him and left him on a South Hadley roadside.

The victim suffered a minor slash wound on his wrist, police said, which he said was caused by the man who had the knife.

Police said the victim will be held for his own protection. They also said that the victim was the same man who was allegedly assaulted by another Amherst College student last week, in connection with an unpaid gambling debt, according to Amherst Police.

The first assault occurred in the victim's room Monday night Nov. 14, when a 24-year-old man allegedly attacked him and threatened him with a pair of scissors. John Man Sing Eng, of the University Park Apartments, was arrested at his apartment the next day at 9 p.m. and charged with assault and battery and assault with a dangerous weapon in connection with this incident. Police said they also charged Eng with possession of cocaine and possession with intent to distribute, after police found 21 bags of white powder when they arrested Eng Nov. 15.

Let's get to work, advisors

To the Editor,

I am responding to the article that appeared in Friday's Collegian (11/18/83), "Students crowd CASIAC." I believe that during the pre-registration period there should be more advisors.

However, this is not the solution to the problem. Maybe if the advisors showed up when they were scheduled to, that would help also. I went to the CASIAC office at 9 a.m. on Nov. 21, and there were ten people waiting to see an advisor. I was told the wait to see an advisor would be an hour. The student advisor wasn't sure how long it would be because the faculty advisor hadn't shown up yet, and he was scheduled to be at the office at 8:30.

I agree that there is a problem of the number of students wanting to see the few advisors available. However, the problem will never be solved if the advisors we do have don't show up.

Disgusted and not amused

To the Editor,

I'm angry, I'm frustrated, I'm disgusted and appalled. These feelings are a direct result of Continuing Educations policy changes with regard to registration for intersession classes. Students were mislead as to the policy and dates for registration. This is due to unpublicized changes made two days before catalogues arrived. It is disheartening to discover that many courses were oversubscribed by November 9th, when registration in person, was scheduled to commence November 28th. The question is; why were tuition fees accepted in person on November 9th instead of November 28th when students were continuously lead to believe registration would only be by mail until that date?

Also once again UMass continues its tradition of frustrating and depriving students by oversubscribing classes. We continuously hear about plans for adding sections to overcrowded classes. Again I ask why do we not see these overpublicized plans materialize?

To all those on other planets

To the Editor,

Here I stand in eternal fire and damnation. I do not really know why I am here. All I did was send some third world country 500 nuclear missiles. Who would think that they would actually use them? I never meant to instigate a war.

A friend and colleague of mine told me that we are here because we are indirectly responsible for blowing up planet earth. I don't think that is fair because we didn't want our world to be destroyed. All that we wanted was for all of the little countries of the world to follow our country's political philosophy.

Actually, I think we are here because Providence is angry with us for never believing in him. Well, we only believed in our country. We thought that was good enough.

The people upstairs said they never sent little countries big weapons because Providence had instilled a conscience in them.

Maybe we were wrong not to consider Providence when making our decisions.

Well, what do you want? We were only human.

Please read our holy work

My Dear Sir:

As Almighty GOD, I greet you:

Incompetence is no excuse for ignorance, by some Editors and Publishers who want to destroy a Holy SPIRIT by fanning the flame of hate, which may cause many Souls to go astray, from the comfort of the CREATOR. Be not like them, but publish a story of Love and Devotion to bring back stray sheep to the fold of a Loving Shepherd.

My Son, Eugene, is truly Jesus – resurrected with Me. I bore My Son's pain from that resurrection, and bring glad tidings to the mass of people who believe in the Trinity. Love is not meant to be cast aside as a worn garment, but set upon a pedestal of Grace, where mercy abounds. May Love abound in you to last a lifetime -- and beyond.

Please read Our Works with Grace, then write about Us in your Newspaper, to make believers out of skeptics. The truth should not be hid in Newspaper Morgues throughout the World, but revealed to the population who believe that GOD does Exist in this Dimension of Time and Light.

My son and I are not here, on Earth, to condemn the World, but to refurbish it with abounding Love. True Love can cast out fear in this frightful Nuclear Age. A world cannot survive half-free and half-slave to the whims of mongrels who try to degrade it.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

Scream aloud or you perish

The Day After wasn't the horror movie the hype made it out to be. I wasn't terrified by the Hollywood special effects, nor even the spontaneous hemorrhaging of the young woman during church services. I don't think it's because I'm callous or insensitive, perhaps my reaction is from prior knowledge of the effects of a thermo-nuclear war.

About a year ago, I visited the opening of "The Unforgettable Fire" at the Peace Museum in Chicago. The exhibit was of drawings by the survivors of Hiroshima and Nagasaki done forty years later. Art critics might have said they were childish; defense strategists, inaccurate, but I was horrified by their reality. The artists' trauma of their day after was irrefutable.

Mindy Chateauvert

One drawing depicted a hand held by a woman. Literally a hand. The words on the picture read, "I was trying to pull my daughter out from under the house, but her hand was all I could save." Another showed hundreds of injured people lying in a room, much like the scene in the movie. The words on this picture said, "There was a woman who kept asking for water all day and night, but the water was contaminated so we couldn't give her any. Finally, her cries became whispers, and then she died. To this day, I still wish I had given her some."

There was also a poster from the Japanese freeze movement at the exhibit. Imagine yourself enclosed in a red plastic garbage bag. Push against its sides, push hard. There is no escape, the bag will not break. You suffocate from the heat and lack of air. That was the poster.

What angered me most about the show was not the movie but the "distinguished panelists" and what was not said after it. If it is true that neither the U.S. nor the U.S.S.R. would use nuclear weapons knowing their real effects, then why manufacture them at all? There is not logic in the strategies of build-up or build-down. Why do we need to be able to kill the Russians thousands of times over, and they us? Why, if they are so unthinkable? The only logic to making nuclear weapons, to spend billions, is to actually use them.

Some may be overwhelmed by statistics, billions of dollars for nuclear warheads, but what is most overwhelming for me are the millions of underfed, ill-housed, unhealthy people, the real costs of nuclear production. The human economic contradiction of this is an anathema to me. This is what terrifies and angers me.

If we can't break out of that red plastic bag because its sides only stretch, not break, we can scream. We can scream out loud, together. The Day After leaves us feeling powerless, nuclear annihilation seems inevitable. Scream until we are heard. People in Hiroshima and Nagasaki screamed when the bombs dropped on them, they are still screaming today. Let's not have to scream because it happened to us.

Mindy Chateauvert is a UMass student.

What can be done?

There are many people in this country who are unable to confront the idea of a possible nuclear holocaust simply because the thought is so terrifying. The issue is ignored and pushed under the rug far too many times. We are constantly reassured by our politicians that such a catastrophic event could never occur and that the safety of this nation depends upon its military strength.

The Day After has such a strong impact on us that we can no longer dismiss such a horrifying possibility as myth. The notion of nuclear war becomes all too real. We see it happening in our living rooms. It comes right out of our televisions and slaps us in the face. By acting now we can prevent such a devastating event. Unfortunately, the problem isn't ane easy one.

We are living in a nuclear age where cold war paranoia still prevails. A nuclear freeze and disarmament treaty between the U.S. and Russia would be a first step, but it would not be altogether affective. A freeze would put an end to the construction of nuclear arms but it would not eliminate the danger of nuclear war. Disarmament of American and Soviet arms still doesn't solve the problem for there is always the possibility of smaller nations and terrorists obtaining the bomb.

The major way to deter a nuclear war is to inform people of the potential threat nuclear arms pose on our existence. Why should millions of innocent people die as a result of bureaucratic decisions made by our war crazed leaders? Films such as The Day After are an affective way of showing the nightmare of nuclear war because it visually shows us its devastating affects. The film and films like it should not only be shown in Russia but in every country in the world.

The fateful day JFK was shot

I was two years old in November of 1963 when John F. Kennedy, thirty-fifth President of the United States, was assasinated. I have obviously no recollection of the event, only the admiration of my father -- to see, his bookshelves filled with books on Kennedy, a kind of respect and fascination for a continuous enigma in the American experience.

Paul Banks

So we look back, twenty years later, and celebrate Kennedy's death. Was it his death that made him great, or was it his life? My own opinion is that Kennedy was full of life, and we know it, and that's what made him great, and that's why his assasination is so unjust.

Clearly, having been bombarded from all sides with memorials from television, newspapers and magazines, we know that Kennedy was no saint. Clearer still, he was not infallible. Just a man. A mortal man. Not a God. But still the jury comes in:

"We award the defendant disdain for the "missile gap" claim while campaigning in 1960, disdain for initiating the arms race, disdain for the Bay of Pigs, disdain for allowing J. Edgar Hoover's F.B.I. to harass Martin Luther King. We award praise to the defendant, however, for resolving the Cuban Missile Crisis, for establishing the Nuclear Test Ban Treaty. Praise for the Peace Corps, praise for the Alliance for Progress, praise for handing Berlin, praise for committing the United States to put a man on the moon."

A hung jury, can you believe it? For those of us still looking for a clear decision, perhaps we must consult something else other than the record. Perhaps we should look at the man. Kennedy was, after all, not a particularly successful or great President.

Three things stand out. A millionaire by inheritance, at the age of twenty-one, John F. Kennedy was a driven man. The drive came from his father, a success himself, who drove Kennedy to succeed. Out of this influence came a pursuit of excellence.

Ted Sorenson writes of Kennedy, a man with, "a mind so free of fear and myth and prejudice, so opposed to can't and cliche's, so unwilling to feign or be fooled, to accept or reflect mediocrity..."

A second characteristic of Kennedy was his idealism. In an address to the United Nations on September 25, 1961, Kennedy said: "Today every inhabitant of this planet must contemplate the day when it may no longer be habitable. Every many, woman and child lives under a nuclear sword of Damocles, hanging by the slenderest of threads, capable of being cut at any moment by accident, miscalculation or madness. The weapons of war must be abolished before they abolish us."

A final worthy attribute of Kennedy's was his ability to learn from mistakes, from new knowledge and new experiences. Kennedy grew and changed throughout his entire life. This stands out, because personal growth and development is what life itself is all about. John Kennedy believed that we all have different opportunities in life, and that to miss them, whatever they may be, is a sin. To him the measure of success in life was not so much what you did in your lifetime, but how few opportunities you missed.

Kennedy missed few opportunities and he grew as a person because of it. In the words of Ladies Morrow, "One of Kennedy's strongest qualities was his capacity to learn from experience, to grow."

These comprise by far the elusive verdict on Kennedy. We would do good to take them to heart in our own lives, and to remember. To the extent that each of us have our own potential yet to fulfill, John Kennedy was special. He came close to meeting his.

Don't leave the driving to them

To the Editor,

As Thanksgiving approaches many of you will be taking bus transportation home. Please do not take Greyhound. Greyhound bus drivers are on strike. The reason for the strike is this: Greyhound Corporation with profits of 103 million dollars last year, is demanding a 25 percent cut in salary and benefits from their workers. By offering cheap rides and using "scab" drivers, the company is attempting to break the union, and force bus drivers back to a stage where the only rights workers have are those given to them by the company at their discretion.

Since Reagan took office and fired PATCO strikers, union-busting has been on the menu for corporations all across the country. Greyhound will negotiate with the union only when they are forced to by financial conditions. This is where we come in. Don't leave the driving to Greyhound this vacation. Take Trailways, Peter Pan, or carpool. Remember, Solidarity begins at home.

Voting may be good for you

To the Editor,

Why should students be concerned with Voter Registration? Because by registering to vote and then voting, students can have a greater impact on their environment. Students' interests are ignored and disregarded by the political system; a great deal of current legislation reflects these sentiments. Some examples are the Solomon Amendment on the federal and state level, the attempt to increase the drinking age, and the lack of student representation on boards that dictate policies for students.

Students can change these policies and hopefully prevent them from occuring in the future by helping elect people who are sympathetic to students needs. But as long as students are widely perceived as an apathetic populace we will continue to be disregarded by the lawmakers.

To make voter registration easier and more accessible to students, the voter registrar will be on campus on Tuesday November 29 from 11 a.m.-4 p.m. She will be on the Campus Center Concourse to register people to vote in Amherst -- also available will be change of address forms for people who have moved since they registered to vote so that they will be able to vote in the upcoming presidential primaries.

I hope people will take a minute to register to vote since this is one of the few ways we have of affecting the political system that has such a tremendous impact on our lives.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT

The University Store is...

This temporary move is due to the need to remove asbestos from the ceilings of the University Store and Campus Center Concourse.

In order to minimize disruption of services to the University Community, alternatives have been established by the Campus Center Board of Governors and Staff. The University Store will continue to operate from temporary facilities in the Student Union Building in order to provide necessary and needed goods and services. The following rooms will be used; S.U.B. Ballroom and Cape Cod Lounge. The initial move will be to the Cape Cod Lounge on November 28th. The Store will continue to operate in both locations until the moving process is complete.

Additional study areas will be announced as of November 28th, to accomodate students.

Black Affairs

Revolutions a threat to capitalistic system

By CAMDEN PIERCE
Collegian Staff

The revolutions in Latin America and the Caribbean are part of an historical progression towards self-determination, according to Robert Chrisman, co-founder and editor-in-chief of the Black Scholar, who spoke Friday at the University of Massachusetts.

Rooted in the physical and cultural genocide of the people of Latin America and the Caribbean by the Spanish and English colonizers, the revolutions are percieved as threatening by an exploitive, capitalistic economic system centered in the United States, said Chrisman.

Chrisman said the Spanish in Latin America and the British in the Caribbean established a "Metropole" system, in which colonies were ruthlessly exploited for their natural resources, to benefit the mother countries. In emergingas a world power, the United States took over the role of suppressing the people of the region, he said.

The "sugarization" of Cuba was part of the Metropole's strategy of "divide and rule." By turning into a "monocrop" economy, Cuba became dependent upon Metropole goods for survival, Chrisman said.

Since the overthrow of the capitalistic government of Cuba in 1959, the revolutionary government has tried to diversify Cuba's economy with marked success, despite interference from the United States, he said.

"By pursuing the path to independence, Cuba has won the respect of the World community, and developed itself prodigiously," Chrisman said.

The United Stated is entering into economic crisis, Chrisman said. Because labor is a socializing force, the chronic unemployment of black and white youth is causing their social alienation. Further, the increasing military budget is at the expense of social infrastructure, he said.

"We'er building an intolerable climate of hostility, fear, and anxiety...which not only makes for human suffering and misery, but which itself increases the possibility of world destruction,"he said.

By nationalizing resources, abolishing racism and guaranteeing income and health care to its citizens, Chrisman said Cuba is effecting a Renaissance of not only political and economic significance, but also a "Renaissance of consciousness."

Militarism and Fascism are increasingly becoming the "mode for dealing with political and social problems (in Latin America and the Caribbean)," Chrisman said. Admonishing the audience to fight the trend, he said "we must not be fascised while we live here."

MEP head looks for new horizons

By YADIRA BETANCES

"We have been conditioned and constantly told that we don't have the capability to succeed" said Reynolds Winslow, new director of the Minority Engineering Program in the School of Engineering at the University of Massachusetts in a recent interview. "It is clear that we do," he said citing the fact that the number of minority graduates in professional fields is increasing.

A native of Albauburn, New York, Winslow began his post in September. He replaced Ting-wei Tang, who served three years as part-time director for the program.

Before coming to the University this year, Winslow directed a similar engineering program for minorities for seven and a half years at the L.C. Smith College of Engineering at Syracuse University.

Winslow is a '61 graduate of Syracuse University with a degree in industial engineering.

He is a charter member of the National Association for Minoriity Engineering Program Administrators (NAMEPA), a network of individuals dedicated to increasing the participation of minority engineering students in college level programs, and the American Society for Engineering Education (ASEE).

Winslow said he views his new directing position as "a challenge in another prestigious institution in New England." He said he likes his new position, and feels absolute satisfaction performing it. His greatest reward, he said lies in his ability to change people's lives by exposing them to the opportunities offered in engineering.

"We need role models in the industrial and teaching area desperately," he said. Winslow said his immediate concerns as director are to be able to communicate to the entire program body in the most effective way to find new ways of helping minorities in engineering, and be able to create a student run chapter of the National Society of Black Engineers (NSBE).

A plan already in progress, the chapter will be developed by creating interest through the community with the support of blacks in Syracuse.

The student chapter of the society will be a "communication device to inform present and future engineering students." Winslow said it is unfortunate that "black" is part of the title because the society "serves the need of all minorities."

As long range term plans, Winslow said he hopes to increase the program's counseling staff to make it more effective for students. He said he hopes to increase corporate funding, build a strong NSBE chapter, and expects to visit community colleges, particularly in New England, to attract more minorities. By 1988, he said he hopes to graduate eight thousand minority students.

The New Models

Boston's next big thing

SIGHT AND SOUND
New Models

By THOMAS VINCENT
Collegian Correspondent

Many innovative new wave bands have emerged from out of the Boston music scene. Groups like the Rings, Mission of Burma, and the Atlantics in the past have gained local as well as national success. Once again Boston has produced yet another band, whose national success is certainly in the realm of possibility. The band I'm boasting about is the New Models.

Sight and Sound is the name of their debut album (it's actually a five song E.P). The three man band consists of Steven Thurber (who plays synthesizers, drum machines, and sings), Michel Johnson (drums), and Casey Lindstrom (lead vocals, guitars, synthesizers). The album has had a fair amount of radio play around New England. One song entitled "Say What," was one of Boston radio station WBCN's top local singles. The New Models also have some national progress. Their video "Strangers in Disguise" has appeared on Music Television (MTV).

The album's material definitely has an upbeat sound. The mixture of Johnson's drums with Thurber's rhythm machines, gives the band an immistakably unique sound. Casey Lindstrom's vocals are somewhat harsh, but give a haunting light on songs like "Listen," and "Just a Motion." By far the best song on the album is "Say What." It opens with a bubble gum sort of rhythm, but when Johnson's drums, and Lindstrom's guitar set in, take a seat and hold on.

The New Models are also known for putting on superb live shows. They are one of the bands featured on the album Live At The Metro, which is a collection of Boston bands playing live at the Metro. The two songs, "Can't Relate" and "Future Assasins" give a good example of what the New Models sound like live.

Trower backs it up

BACK IT UP (CHRYSALIS)
Robin Trower

By PETER BENTTINEN
Collegian Staff

Back It Up is this Engish guitarist's seventh solo album since he left the confines of the quite successful Procol Harum. He was only a side musician on that hit song, "A White Shade of Pale," during the early 1970's, but he has since blossomed as a solo artist. His side musicians have changed often through his solo career. On his fifth and sixth recordings, he had Jack Bruce, former bassist with Eric Clapton during his heyday with the super-group Cream. James Dewer takes care of the vocals on this album along with Frankie Miller, another English crooner who also sang with him before his first albulm was put in the stores. Frankie left because of stylistic differences.

Trower has never been much of a singer, he's been just the guitar player who gets the accreditation for his bands work. He used to be a magician with special effects, such as the wah—wah pedal, but on this album he plays sans help from them allowing his playing to "do the talking." sound is also changed from his other recordings in that he is now his own producer. His production makes the guitar sound a bit too metallic. This album really does not have as much kick to it as the others, but is still worth a listen, especially for electric players.

This record starts off with the title song, "Back It Up." It's an upbeat song in which it sounds as if it is a guitar over-dub. As most of the songs on this album are played, the music is presented in a certain form. It's the form used on most all records these days actually. The song begins with two phases of singing, a break for the solo instrument, which here is Trower's ex cellent guitar playing, followed by more singing to a general

The second song, "River," has an excellent opening guitar part that with the drum beat gives the feel of "going down a river." "Black to Red" puts the hammer down with a repetitve lick on Robin's trusty Fender Stratocaster. His work on guitar commands the beat to move forward, even further than the drumming of Bobby Clouter, the fifth drummer Trower has used in his recordings. The final tune on this side is a slow—down affair that allows his guitar to be at the forefront. At the end of this song he heats up the vinyl as much as the beat will allow to.

Side two continues along the same venues with Trower's guitar holding up the front. Here can be heard his little trick of making it feel he is playing many notes to get his goal without actually making them sound. "Islands" starts with what could be the ocean coming of his playing. Only his guitar tells the story of the islands. They must be nice islands! On the second side the songs start out with little guitar parts that are well-done. "None But The Brave' has one of these licks to get the tune started.

"Settling The Score," the last song of the album, shows his blues influence the best of any song on the album with its characteristic beat. He has a bit too much of a white influence to be in the category of stars such as B. B. King, but then there are few that do.

L.A.'s best proved less than X-citing

Wednesday, Nov. 16
The Rusty Nail, Sunderland

By LISA MOSLEY
Collegian Staff

Early into X's show at the Nail last Wednesday, John Doe insisted that we were all gonna have fun, and as he said, "Would John Doe fuckin' lie to you?"

Well, maybe.

Don't get me wrong—I really love these guys. And yes, everything that's repeated almost verbatum from review to feature to review etc. is true. X is one of the very few bands to emerge from the L.A. punk scene with the ability to expand and develop stylistically. It's simple: X is a great band. But Wednesday's was not a great show.

Understand that it was a good show; I don't think that a band with that kind of talent is capable of giving a bad performance. I just don't think the one they gave last week was of the high caliber fans have come to expect.

The song list was broad and satisfying, with tunes ranging from the early "Los Angeles" and "Johnny Hit And Run Pauline" to the most recent "More Fun in the New World" and "Breathless." With four albums' worth of material behind them, the progression X has made to their current hard-driving, country-edged sound can easily be traced.

Of course, Billy Zoom was flawless as usual. Not only does he play a damn good guitar, he does it without sweating. Or moving. Or changing his facial expression. (Now, I'm well aware that Gerry Garcia doesn't move when he plays, either. It's just that Zoom does nothing with a lot more style.)

On a basic, musical level, the show was OK: good songs performed well by a talented band. It's not that aspect I'm complaining about. What marred this show was attitude.

From the moment he stepped on stage, John took obvious pains to convey to the audience his dismay at having to play in Western Mass. (Woah! Here we are in Sunderland! I hear this place is a rockin' town! Fuckin' Al) Now, a little pompus spewing from a man who probably got lost in the wilds of Greenfield while trying to find the club is understandable. The lethargy of the set wasn't.

The band showed at plenty of shows in the past. The two big offenders here were John and Exene. John seems to have moved more or less into the spotlight, and Exene spends a lot of time wandering aimlessly around the stage, tugging at her US Olympic Drinking Team Sweatshirt. (If she was that bored, she could've sat down on the drum riser...)

Hey, c'mon guys! We don't like being stuck in this musical desert any more than you liked having to come out here. And yes, we're really sorry that you probably didn't make a whole lot of money on this gig (tickets cost about $4 less than at this month's Boston date. But are the fans who came out last Wednesday any less enthusiastic than those in the "big cities"? Don't they deserve your best, too? I'd like to think so.

UM overcame weaknesses to win Championship

By ED CUNNINGHAM
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts volleyball team embarked on their 1983 season with high hopes and some lofty dreams. The 1982 version of the spikers had compiled a 25-27 record, so aspirations of reaching the post season ECAC tournament seemed far away.

The philosophy of Coach Elaine Sortino can be simply stated. To become the best, you have to play the best. Thus the division II spikers began a difficult 50 match schedule against the top flight division I and II volleyball programs of the east coast.

The young team (no seniors) played poised but somewhat cautious volleyball for the first half of the season. The wins were coming, but several times the team seemed wary of the opposition. They were winning, but the other schools were scholarship schools. Could UMass the state school be as good as their competition?

Following the mid point of the season, the spikers traveled to Delaware. UMass had been invited to compete in their division 1 tournament. Following the tournament, the spikers realized they could have beaten their opponents if they had only gotten a few breaks. They may not have beaten the foes on this occasion, but they certainly defeated any doubts they may have had about their actual ability.

The following weekend, a determined UMass team traveled to Vermont for a division II tournament. The determination paid dividends and UMass came home with their first tourney victory ever.

From Vermont until the end of the season all doubt and awe of the competition was cast away and the spikers charged forward in the hopes of being selected for the ECAC tournament.

The invitation came, and along with it was the number one seeding. As was the case in Vermont, UMass would not be denied. The spikers peaked last Saturday and the unlucky foe was Springfield College. The spikers defeated Springfield in straight games and were crowned ECAC champions.

The ECAC trophy sits in Sortino's office but the story behind it is as impressive as the prize. Summary of the season and championship was as simple as her playing philosophy, "Who would have thought?"

Moffet fired

NEW YORK (AP) — Ken Moffett was fired as executive director of the Major League Players Association Tuesday, less than a year after he was elected as the union head, three separate sources told The Associated Press.

One of the sources, who requested anonymity, said Marvin Miller, the man whom Moffett succeeded, would act as interim executive director. Former Miller aide Richard Moss, now a player agent, later confirmed the firing and Miller's interim stewardship.

Moss, contacted at his Pacific Palisades, Calif., office, said he understood Miller would act as interim executive director only until the union's executive board meets in Hawaii on Dec. 5.

They are questions that will only be answered if he comes back. Returned legend or helpless hanger on. Gordie Howe or Willie Mays. Carl Yastrzemski or Muhammed Ali. George Blanda or ...

Maybe ten years from now the sports world will look back with excitement and remember the succesful comeback of Jim Brown. Or maybe they will remember how he changed his mind and backed out of a return gracefully. Hopefully, though, they won't look back and remember how a legend was sadly embarrassed.

Jim Brown's return to the NFL-a good or bad idea?

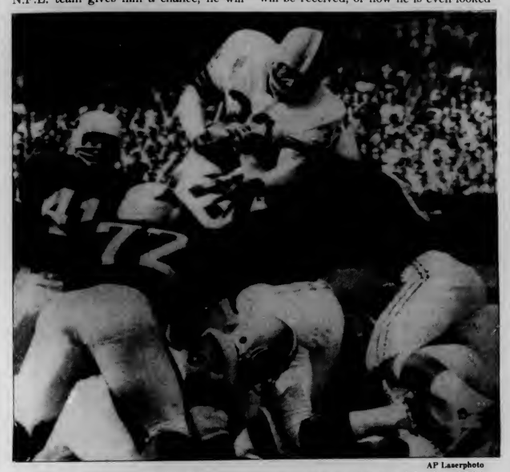
RUSS WHINNEM

The man is a legend indeed. One of the greatest, they have said. Perhaps never another runner like him. Now, in some eyes that legend has been tarnished. Words have been said, claims have been made, accusations have been leveled.

Jim Brown, the all-time leading rusher in National Football League history is coming back. At least that is what he says he will do if certain things happen. If another pretty prominent running back, namely Pittsburgh's Franco Harris, breaks Brown's record (he's about 450 yards behind) and an N.F.L. team gives him a chance, he will return next year.

Incredible? Yes. Brown last touched a professional football 18 years ago. He is now 47 years old. Eighteen years ago there weren't that many 300 pound linebackers frothing at the mouth for the opportunity to stop Jim Brown. Forty-seven year old bones break a lot easier than 29 year old bones.

Impossible? That's something that can't be determined without performances being seen. Some say Brown was and still is an incredible physical speciman. Besides that, nothing can take away the fact that he was the best. Can that be retained? Can it be frozen through time, enduring a retirement? Maybe he can, maybe it can still be put together. But still there's the question of the legs, of the speed, of the bones.



There is also the wonder of how Brown will be received, or how he is even looked upon now. The comments he made were not very kind. Saying that Harris is simply hanging around to break his record does not make for good public relations. Records were made to be broken, they always have, they always will. Brown's is no different. If Franco didn't crack it, someday someone else will.

There is, however, probably not much question that he will get a chance. The Cleveland Browns, for who he did his running before, have already said that he is welcome in camp next summer. The publicity would be enough incentive for many teams to take a chance. If Brown produces, the organization looks great on and off the field. If he doesn't then everyone will know it was a longshot anyway.

The fans and media would soak it up. You thought John Elway and Ralph Sampson got a lot of coverage? The opponents would be inspired to be the one to stop him, although inside, they probably will not wish to see him do poorly. The Steelers, of course, may be an exception to that. Franco is their leader. Hearing Brown's remarks will make them very hungry.

So now it comes down to the man himself. Will he or won't he? Can he or can't he? Should he or shouldn't he? Forty-seven years old is closing in on middle age. 1965 was a long time ago. It would have been better if he hadn't made his remarks and accusations, if he had just announced the comeback without them. It certainly did not sound at all classy. Then again, would it really have made much of a difference? Does he honestly think he can still be great or is he sacrificing his pride simply by coming back, statements or not? There are so many questions.

Hartford shores up defense, They aren't patsies anymore

By GERRY deSIMAS
Collegian Staff

Don't look back too quickly, now folks. They are not entrenched in last place any more. They are only a game under .500. They were ahead of the famed Montreal Canadiens, who were struggling in last place of the National Hockey League's Adams Division (they should rename it the Black and Blue Division). They are only a point behind the Habs.

The Whalers, who have been tough at home this year (6-1-1 so far), have already beaten the Bruins once and pounded Chicago 6-1 two weeks ago.

Yes, they are the Hartford Whalers, who get as much respect as the University of Massachusetts. Let me rephrase that. They get less.

Who? All of you Bruins fans are saying, while laughing loudly. Well, don't laugh so loud any more. The Whalers aren't the same patsies that finished last in the league last year.

General manager Emile Francis, late of the Blues and once of the Rangers and coach Jack Evans have done an admirable job in making Hartford a competitive team.

One of the sparks has been number two pick Sylvain Turgeon, the fourth leading scorer on the club, an exciting wing that is giving fans in the Civic Center something to cheer about, for once.

The other big guns up front, and no it's not Blaine Stoughton, are Mark Johnson, Ron Francis and Ray Neufeld. Neufeld is the team's leading goal scorer.

The offense seems to be working well but Francis and Evans have shored up the Whale's awful defense from last season, one that gave up the most goals in the league. This year, while still not the greatest, it is better than Montreal, Quebec, Chicago, Edmonton and Minnesota in terms of goals allowed. The Whalers have the league's third best power play.

The power play has improved. Turgeon is fourth in the league with power-play goals. Hartford killed off their 22nd consecutive short-hand situation against the Islanders on last Tuesday. And Hartford ranks right behind Boston (tops in NHL) in killing off penalties. In that game, Hartford also outshot New York 12-4 to open the game.

At the base of the Whaler D is goalie Greg Millen, who looked bad last year due to the lousy defense. This year, he looks a lot better.

Women's hoop host Invitational this weekend

THINGS ARE LOOKING UP - that is, for the UMass Women's Basketball team which starts its season this weekend. The play of Karen Damminger, shown here, will be an important factor on the team.

By ADAM NAZIMOWITZ
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's basketball team is coming off a disappointing 5-22 season, but is hopeful that a new coach, a different attitude and a few new players will bring some more wins and respectability back to the basketball program.

"I always thought UMass would be a good place to go to, and the position became available," said Coach Barbara Stevens who came from Clark University and Division III to UMass and Division II. "This team is eager to do well. They work extremely hard in practice and want to improve their image as a losing team."

This year's team is still young, but they do have an extra year of experience. The team will probably use a three forward, two guard formation. They will try to utilize speed more and pressure defense in order to create turnovers.

"They are very receptive to what we're trying to do. I'd like to try to run a little more, and incorporate a fast-breaking style. We must be more aggressive and improve our defensive skills. We're not the biggest, quickest team, but we will try to protect our own basket and cut down their shooting opportunities. The best offense is a good defense," Stevens added.

The team has eight returning players, led by senior point guard and captain Wendy Ward. She will be looked to as the anchorperson on the team and for her leadership. She will control the offense and meet the ball-handlers on defense.

"I think we're more used to each other so things are running more smoothly," said Ward, who had a 9.9 scoring average and led the team with 87 assists last season. "The coach is giving us the encouragement that we need and the players seem to be incorporating it well. We're more of a fast break team this year and we will play a variety of defenses."

Also returning this season is 5'11" sophomore forward Karen Damminger who led the team with 146 rebounds and was second in scoring with a 12.0 average. She has been hampered by injuries so far but is starting to get over them and will play a major part on the team this year.

"Karen is looking to balance out her game," Stevens said. "She is a natural talent, who is looking to improve her defense further. She will be challenged for the forward spot by 5'10" sophomore forward, Jerrie Bernier. She has worked hard at both ends of the floor."

Bernier and/or Damminger will be joined in the frontcourt by 5'8" sophomore Rebecca Kucks, who was second on the team in rebounds with 143. 6'2" sophomore Kelly Collins will be the other starting forward/center. Kelly led the team in free throw percentage last season, and will be looked to more for scoring this year. Coach Stevens has been impressed with her hard work.

Barbara Hebel, who led the team in scoring last year at a 12.8 clip and was second in assists with 56, will be the shooting guard. "Barbara needs confidence to go against various defensive pressures, and has been working on it in practice," Stevens said. "She is recognizing when to take good shots and is working hard on defense as well."

The other returning players are 5'9" junior forward Jennifer Todd and 5'9" sophomore guard Jean Cooper, who has been injured for most of the pre-season and won't practice for another month.

Some of the new players include 6'2" freshman center Karen Fitzgerald, who is improving steadily with every practice and shows the most improvement according to Stevens. Mary Marquedant a 5'7" freshman guard and Karen Rowe, a 5'9" freshman guard round out the incoming freshmen.

Roz Olson, a 5'6" junior guard who has had one previous year of experience for the Minutewomen in 1981-82 is returning to the team. Patti Kearns is a 5'10" forward who transferred from UNH and is also working hard in practice.

In the pre-season polls UMass was picked for a seventh place tie along with George Washington in the tough Atlantic Ten Conference, which only features nine teams so far.

"Changing from one system to another takes time. If we win games we should and pull off a few upsets we should hold our own in the conference. We're trying to get across that we want them to play as hard as they can with their best skills through practicing hard every day," Stevens said.

The Minutewomen's first game will be this weekend as they host URI, UNH and UConn in the UMass Invitational. UMass will meet UConn in the first game, and the winners of the preliminary games will meet for the championship on Sunday.

Mackertich works hard to success

By JOHN BADGER
Collegian Correspondent

It has been over seven months since Neal Mackertich has played tennis. Those who follow the University of Massachusetts tennis team remember Neal as last year's great first singles player (third in New England) who planned to go professional at the end of last semester.

"I had planned to leave in June to play on a satellite circuit in the France and Belgium areas," said Mackertich. Unfortunately, Mackertich's plans were delayed by an unexpected injury. "It's a bizarre type of injury, more common among basketball than tennis. The ligaments just under my knee have been wearing down over the past few years and luckily it was caught in time to avoid an operation."

Mackertich's belief that hard work is the key to success in tennis is what caused the problem. "I've played tennis four hours a day for the past ten years. All that running around on such a hard surface is what caused the wearing down process in the ligament."

Mackertich plans to begin his comeback this winter, "I'm planning on beginning to play again in early January and slowly build the muscle back up. If things go well I should be back to par by April."

A last semester senior, Mackertich is a high marking chemical engineering student. If things don't work out on the courts, he's prepared himself with something to fall back on.

Fourth annual N.E. tourney hosted by UM this weekend

By GERRY deSIMAS
Collegian Staff

They are not going to take the easy way out. Barbara Stevens, the new coach of the University of Massachusetts and her young troops will be tested right away as they host the fourth annual New England Women's Basketball Tip-Off Tournament Saturday and Sunday at the Cage for those few of you that will be around the area.

UMass, trying to rebound from a disasterous 5-22 season last year, faces a Connecticut team that posted a 9-18 record last season, almost just as bad.

The Minutewomen will host the University of Connecticut at 3 p.m. on Saturday in one semi-final. The University of Rhode Island, Atlantic 10 rivals, face the forminable Wildcats from New Hampshire at 1 p.m.

The championship game will be at 1 p.m. on Sunday for those students returning early and the consolation game will be at 3 p.m.

UMass, trying to rebound from a disasterous 5-22 season last year, faces a Connecticut team that posted a 9-18 record last season, almost just as bad. The Minutewomen beat UConn in this tourney last year 64-43, but lost in the semis to URI 75-53.

The two stronger teams in the tournament, the WRams and New Hampshire meet in the other semi-final. Rhode Island went 20-12 last season, winning 20 games for the first time ever. The WRams return all five starters from the team that finished third in the Atlantic 10 and came in second this tourney last year.

As a matter of fact, New Hampshire has won this tourney each of the three previous years since it was started in 1980 and URI has come in second each time, too.

Michelle Washington, the Atlantic 10 co-rookie of the year, and senior co-captains Helene Roher and Carol Smith (URI's top scorer with 12.9 ave. and team leader in steals with 98) lead URI.

New Hampshire, went 22-7 last year and were the ECAC women's basketball champions. They are considered to be the top team in New England and have crept into some national Top 20 polls. UNH already opened their season with a 90-37 romp of Southern Maine, last week.

UNH is led by senior co-captains Gail Jackson and Corinne Gulas, who combines with her twin sister Chris to form one of the fastest backcourts in the East.

URI has also already won a game beating McGill University of Montreal 73-64 in an exhibition game. For UMass and UConn, this is their season openers.

So, for whoever is around this holiday weekend, there will be some top New England basketball in the Cage on Saturday, especially the URI-UNH game. However, the UMass-UConn game doesn't look to be a bore. These traditional rivals are moving up and it should be a hard-fought game.

DA, police plead for help with fires

By JOHN O'CONNELL
Collegian Staff

A state official is asking Crampton Dormitory residents at the University of Massachusetts to help catch the person setting fires in their Southwest Residential Area dormitory.

W. Michael Ryan, district attorney for Hampshire and Franklin counties, said a state police trooper assigned to the state fire marshall's office has a few leads in his investigation, but "we haven't received any information at all from students."

"We're hopeful that any of the students who saw anything or heard anything could give us a call," Ryan said.

Cramptom residents have been evacuated because of suspicious fires 13 times since September, and the state Fire Marshall visited campus last Wednesday to meet with town and University of Massachusetts officials to determine a solution to the problem.

Residents complained that the fires were an "inconvenience" as they waited outside the building for two hours while police questioned residents after the most recent fire Tuesday night, and Ryan said the fires, set in trash barrels, bulletin boards and bathrooms at night or in the early morning, "have been more or less nuisance fires."

But with five fires in the dorm between Saturday and Tuesday night last week, "activity is accelerating," Ryan said, and "we are fearful that there haven't been any life threatening fires, but there could be."

State Fire Marshall Joseph A. O'Keefe said Tuesday that Gov. Michael S. Dukakis has received calls from parents of residents and is "concerned" about the arson plague, which has included more than 20 suspicious fires in four or five residence areas this semester.

At least two residents will not be returning to the dorm after the Thanksgiving break. First-year communications studies major Kristin Peterson said she and Kimberly Stoll, another first-year Crampton resident, are moving out because "we're too scared to live here anymore."

Sarah Pike, a second-floor Crampton resident, said the fires are "an inconvenience, to say the least," as she waited to get back inside the dormitory Tuesday night. She and Eileen Stout, another second-floor resident, claimed they could get no information from University officials on the problem.

"I think the students have found the investigation has been more disruptive than the actual fires," Ryan said. But students should direct their anger at the arsonist, not the investigators, he said, and if someone is caught, "the fires will stop, the investigation will stop, and students can go back to their studies."

Activities included in new kind of transcripts

By THERESA GALVIN
Collegian Correspondent

University of Massachusetts students will soon have an opportunity to record their extra-curricular activities to show prospective employers in a co-curricular transcript.

"We try to show that participation in different activities will lead to education, will lead to growth expansion."

— Joel Weissman SCERA director

The co-curricular transcript program has been approved by the Student Senate and is targeted to begin next semester, said Joel Weissman, director of the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocasy (SCERA).

The program proposal describes the transcript as "a mechanism to enable students to record their extra-curricular activities and plot their growth in a wide-range of skills.

"The transcript is a way of documenting the educational value of the activities on campus," the proposal continued.

Weissman said the co-curricular transcript is a way to coordinate student activities with the educational learning process.

"We try to show that participation in different activities will lead to education, will lead to growth expansion," Weissman said. "We hope that by recording activities students can see their development."

Students wishing to participate in the voluntary program will meet with trained advisors, Weissman said.

SCERA is now writing forms and a brochure explaining the program.

"We don't want it confused with academic transcripts," Weissman said.

Co-curricular transcript programs have been successfully implemented by a number of colleges and universities. According to the "Co-Curricular Transcript — What Do Employers Think? A National Survey", employers are impressed with this type of transcript.

"Results of this national survey suggest the co-curricular transcript is preferred by employers over the traditional resume of a career planning and placement center."

Weissman said the transcript will be valuable in monitoring individual growth, and will be usefull to send out with a resume or placed in a credential file.

Open meetings start as college looks for dean

By TOM MIDDLETON
Collegian Staff

A search committee for a dean of the College of Food and Natural Resources at the University of Massachusetts will hold four seminars this week open to the public to aid in the final selection.

Each of the four candidates for the position will make a short presentation and answer questions at one of the seminars, according to search committee member Ernest Buck of the Food Science and Nutrition department.

"We urge students from the college (Food and Natural Resources) to attend," Buck said.

The committee will interview the candidates next week and make it's recommendations to acting Provost Samuel Conti.

"We are trying to move rapidly, hopefully we can get someone in by next semester," Buck said.

The former dean of the college, Daniel Padberg, resigned from the post on July 8. Assistant Dean David E. Leonard then replaced him in an acting capacity, as Padberg returned to the faculty.

Earlier this fall, Leonard expressed concern over reduced funding and subsequent faculty shortages as challenges facing the college. He also noted his intent to maintain quality programs in his role as acting dean until the search committee appoints a permanent successor.

The first seminar will begin at noon today in Campus Center room 804 and candidate R. Glenn Brown, head of Food Science and Nutrition Department, will answer questions.

At noon Tuesday in 804 CC, Leonard, acting dean and director of the Massachusetts Agriculture Experiment Station, will be the subject of the search committee's seminar.

At noon Wednesday in room 903 CC, head of the division of Hotel, Restaurant and Travel Administration Dr. Stevenson Fletcher will answer questions.

Bruce MacDougall, head of the Landscape Architecture Department, will answer questions at noon on Thursday in room 804.

Palestinians ignoring cease-fire, Druse and Christians still fighting

TRIPOLI, Lebanon (AP) — Rival Palestinian soldiers traded fire sporadically across their tense cease-fire line Sunday and Beirut radio said Druse and Christian militiamen renewed artillery clashes in the Chouf mountains.

President Amin Gemayel went to Rome and Washington in efforts to get foreign troops out of Lebanon.

There were official reports from Damascus that Syria's president, Hafez Assad, met with leaders of his party, countering widespread rumors that he was dead or seriously ill. Assad has not been seen in public for two weeks.

For the second day, the Syrian military command said its forces had "confronted" a U.S. F-14 reconnaissance jet over the Metn Mountains northeast of the Lebanese capital. On Saturday the Syrians also claimed to have "confronted" a U.S. warplane.

Neither indicated whether the Syrians had fired on the jets. U.S. officials routinely refuse comment on reconnaissance flights.

The scattered shelling in Tripoli came despite an agreement between supporters and opponents of Palestine Liberation Organization Chairman Yasser Arafat to end weeks of warfare and withdraw from this northern port city.

Ahmed Abdul-Rahman, spokesman for Arafat, said Rashid Karami, a former Lebanese prime minister, was expected to announce details of the disengagement agreement in Damascus on Monday.

Egypt taking bids on N-plants, Westinghouse is among bidders

CAIRO, Egypt (AP) — Egypt has received five bids, including two from American companies, to build its first two nuclear power plants, the daily newspaper Al-Ahram said Sunday.

The paper quoted electricity and energy minister Maher Abaza as saying the five companies were Westinghouse Corp. and Bechtel Corp. of the United States, Kraftwerk Union of West Germany, Framatome Consortium of France and Brown-Boveri Corp. of Switzerland and West Germany.

Abaza said three committees were studying the bids and that it would be three to six months before a decision was made.

The plants, estimated to cost about $2.4 billion, are to be built by 1990 or 1991, in El-Dabaa, 100 miles west of the Mediterranean port of Alexandria. Construction will start next September.

Egypt hopes to produce 40 percent of its energy by nuclear power by the year 2000.

Bloody coup feared in Philippines

NEWTON, (AP) — A display of Benigno S. Aquino's bloody shirt and trousers and a warning to the United States against backing military repression in the Philippines marked the commemoration Sunday of the birthday of the slain politician who lived here for three years before his death.

'There are fears of a military takeover in the Philippines that will be even more repressive," said Manila attorney Charito Planas. "We would like to join in asking the U.S. government not to support the military takeover.

"The United States government must stop considering the Philippines as the home of the biggest U.S. bases outside the United States but start considering it as a country of 50 million people who have been denied thier freedom."

Ms. Planas, who left the Philippines five years ago being jailed and now lives in Arlington, Va., spoke on the impact of Aquino's Aug. 21 assassination in Manila at a Boston church meeting marking the 51st anniversary of Aquino's birthday.

Highway deaths drastically down from Thanksgiving weekend, 1982

AP — At least six highway deaths were reported in Massachusetts over the long Thanksgiving weekend, far less than the 20 recorded for the same weekend last year.

State officials had warned motorists that unannounced roadblocks would be set up by state police and Massachusetts Registry of Motor Vehicles personnel in an effort to keep drunken drivers off the road.

The latest fatality occurred at 1:10 p.m. Sunday in Quincy, where police said an East Milton man veered off the road because of an undetermined medical problem.

Exxon accused of water thievery

PORT EWEN, N.Y. (AP) — Environmentalists call it "a new form of piracy," Exxon Corp. says it hasn't done anything wrong.

But the corporate oil giant has created an uproar by collecting millions of gallons of fresh water from the Hudson River and then transporting it to the Caribbean earlier this year.

"The idea that a corporation can come in, take our water, leave the country and sell it and do it all free of charge is outrageous," said John Cronin, who as paid riverkeeper for the Hudson River Fishermen's Association monitors the river's use.

Last month, Cronin and his group charged Exxon with dumping polluted salt water into the Hudson then collecting fresh water for use in its Aruba refinery and to sell to the Caribbean island's government.

In a letter to Exxon, the organization charged that not only were tankers, after delivering oil to Exxon's New Jersey refinery, traveling the 75 miles up the Hudson to load up with water, but idle tankers were making the journey solely to take water to arid Aruba.

Sixty tankers, carrying fresh water, have made the trip this year, according to Exxon, 20 making the 1,900-mile journey just for the fresh water. Exxon said it transported some 360 million gallons of water to Aruba in 1983. Cronin and his group claim the corporation has taken between 500 million and 1 billion gallons this year.

"Exxon was getting into the water resource business and the Hudson was a great place to open shop," Cronin said.

Central Plains plagued by drifts, snowstorm moving to Northeast

AP — Drifts up to 8 feet high, ice half an inch thick and zero visibility made travel nearly impossible Sunday in the central Plains as a snowstorm chugged northeastward after plastering the Rockies.

Denver declared a snow emergency and its airport, fifth busiest in the nation, was closed.

At least 41 deaths have been blamed on the past week's weather.

UM research helping heal stroke victims

By JEANETTE DeFORGE
Collegian Correspondent

Because of the work being done by a University of Massachusetts professor, 40 partially paralyzed stroke victims can move their damaged limbs again.

Professor Walter Kroll, of the exercise science department has been working with stroke patients completely paralyzed in one arm and one ankle. He said the paralysis is caused by a learning problem with the brain.

"We analyze the undamaged part of the brain and make a blueprint," Kroll said. "We then send electrical stimuli to the brain through the paralyzed arm and ankle."

The patients receive the treatments one hour a day, five days a week for four to six weeks.

"There is no deterioration," Kroll said.

As a result, all 40 patients were able to lift their arm at a 90 degree angle, and grip and lift an object, and bend their ankles, Kroll said.

Kroll said this success is "amazing" because, according to the Diagnosis of the Management of Strokes and TIA's, published in 1982, "neurologic deficiency which persists for more than six months should be considered permanent."

Kroll expanded his research, which began with adult stroke victims, to children who have suffered from strokes or cerebral palsy.

"Children have more plasticity of the brain," and hence can recover faster and more thoroughly than adults, Kroll said.

Kroll said he also plans to work with victims of Parkinson's disease, which causes muscles to become rigid, and eventually hopes to be able to treat any pathological problem with the brain.

The research began three years ago when Kroll and Pierre Lagasse of Laval University in Quebec City, Canada, were trying to improve speed and efficiency in athletes.

With the help of William Kilmar of the UMass department of electrical engineering, the group discovered a way to improve the athletes' speed and coordination through electrical impulses.

Kroll said they realized using these impulses would be unethical for athletes, but realized the process could possibly help paralyzed people.

Cranston to speak on nuclear freeze in SUB

Sen. Alan Cranston, D-Calif., will speak on the nuclear arms freeze at 2:30 p.m. Tuesday in the Student Union Ballroom at the University of Massachusetts.

Cranston, a candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination, has made the arms freeze a major plank in his campaign platform. He is currently the Senate minority whip, the number two Democratic position in the Senate.

Preceding the lecture, the UMass Peacemakers will sponsor an assembly with speakers advocating the freeze movement. Frances Crowe, a member of the American Friends Service Committee, is one freeze proponent scheduled to speak at the 2 p.m. gathering.

UMass group receives $5000 grant from state

'They don't have the expertise to pour through volumes of regulations. In many cases they don't know if they are in compliance with the new regulations or not.'
Rick Taupier
acting EEMC director

By PAUL TOMICH
Collegian Correspondent

The Environmental Education and Management Center (EEMC) at the University of Massachusetts has been awarded a $5,000 grant to begin educating local companies on regulations concerning hazardous waste.

Rick Taupier, acting EEMC director, said the grant money, donated by the State Bureau of Solid Waste Disposal, will allow the Center to educate small scale hazardous waste generators in Franklin County—including tanneries, printers, dry cleaners and furniture refinishing plants—on recent state and federal regulations regarding hazardous waste management. Small scale generators are companies that produce between 20 and 1000 kilograms of hazardous waste a month.

Taupier said the Center wants to educate the smaller companies because they "don't have the expertise and the staff to pour through the volumes of regulations. In many cases they don't know if they are in compliance with the new regulations or not.

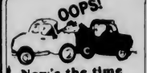
"Larger plants," he says, "have to report every amount of waste they generate and what happens with it," while the smaller companies do not.

"The idea is to try to work with them to develop a reasonably simple technique to identify whether of not there are certain regulations that are likely to affect them and then...determine whether or not they are complying with those regulations," Taupier said.

He said he feels that while a study has not been done to establish the fact that small waste generators constitute a serious hazard to health or the environment, this program is worthwhile because it will make people aware of potential problems.

The Center also plans to develop a method by which hazardous waste coordinators—volunteers who keep track of wastes in their community—can identify local waste generators. There are 351 coordinators in Massachusetts.

The Center will also hold several workshops across Franklin County on groundwater protection.



Their purpose will be to educate planning officials, local environmental organization members, and citizens in hydrogeology and the way hazardous wastes from small-scale generators can affect water supplies. They will also learn how they can test the quality of their own water.

Taupier said the EEMC, a self-supporting non-profit component of the University, strives to educate local, regional, state, and federal agencies, non-profit organizations and business and industry groups and the general public in regard to environmentally related issues. By acting as a sort of "clearing house" for environmentally related information, the Center breaks down and organizes information from various departments on campus and other sources into a form that can be understood by the above mentioned groups, Taupier said.

Since the Center's founding in 1981 it has "run a whole variety of (environmentally related) educational seminars and technical short courses for the industry," Taupier said.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The real meaning of patriotism

If the leaders and legislators of our nation do not realize the urgent need for a moratorium on the production of new nuclear and chemical weapons, the world is going to suffer the increasing threat of total annihilation. While it is a priority of the Reagan Administration to increase our national defense budget, they would do the entire world an immeasurably great service if they instead put our funds to more constructive uses.

Thomas Pitoniak

If one ignores this dangerous trend toward increased armament, one is only leaving the matter to others, which is morally a disservice to the rest of the world. Who are some of the "others"? They're people like Ronald Reagan and John Glenn, who both support the appropriation of more than $120 million to recommence the production of "nerve gas," or chemicals for the purpose of killing people. Do you remember napalm jelly? It clung to the skin and burned until self-consumption. The same chemical giants that gladly produced Agent Orange are ready to once again secure lucrative contracts with the government.

With an arsenal that is already unimaginable in its destructive potential, what is the reason(s) behind our determination to further endanger the fragile conditions of this planet? One reason is the recent resurgence of anti-Soviet sentiment that seems to me to have begun fomenting during the hostage crisis and the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan in 1979. I'll be the first to admit that I don't approve of Soviet hegemony. But why, regardless of the reason, should we produce the same insidious chemicals that we have been indignantly accusing the Soviets of using in Afghanistan?

If we commence production of these pernicious weapons we are showing our hypocrisy to the whole world, regardless of the arguments we put forth in our defense. If chemical weapons are morally despicable in their killing of innocent civilians, as has occurred in Afghanistan with "yellow rain," how can we justify it ourselves? Morality is not removeable for convenience.

I disagree with those who justify our participation in the arms race by proclaiming patriotic devotion. If patriotism is your rationale, consider the effects on our nation of this costly competition. Even if the bombs and missiles are never used, the monetary and human resources funneled in this direction is sapping the collective strength of the whole world. Can we afford to put over $200 billion into defense when we can't even afford Social Security? When the federal deficit is itself over $200 billion? In this respect, Reagan and all supporters of an increased defense budget are not truly patriotic; they are not acting in the best interests of our country. Those who desire to prevent the decay of our nation are the real patriots, unswayed by enmity.

Sexism comes in many forms

The term sexism is made of two component parts, positive sexism and negative sexism. In negative sexism, we find the stereotypical oppressive insults that openly state the alleged inferiority of women when compared to men. Such terms as "Woman Driver" or "Dumb blonde" are examples of negative sexism. Positive sexism, on the other hand, is sexism that does not directly insult or harm a woman.

The woman is put upon a pedestal in positive sexism, by such actions as a male opening a car door for her, or locking it beside her. Positive sexism is harmless by itself, providing it does not aggravate the woman. The danger lies in the fact that it carries a potential power, instrumental guilt. This guilt is instrumental in the sense that it propels action by almost brainwashing its victims; destroying them mentally.

Lisa Stratouly

George is a forty-five year old, recently divorced, semi-alcoholic man who is bored with his life but loves his work. He is a bartender at Studio 4, a once successful disco that is becoming tired of existing. He has worked at Studio 4 for about fifteen years now and is quite satisfied with his work; He enjoys meeing new people every night; especially women.

Cheryl is an eighteen year old high school senior who was recently hired to work at Studio 4 during the summer as a cocktail waitress. She had waitressed before in restaurants, but never worked in a bar. She was excited that with her eighteenth birthday came the legality needed for her to serve alcohol and make substantially larger tips.

From the first day he saw her, George was instantly attracted to Cheryl. He found her naivete and sincerity a rare occurrence in such an atmosphere. George sensed that Cheryl was not happy with her employment situation; the pace was too fast for her. She frequently mixed up her orders as well as the drinks themselves which consequently led to fewer tips. After expressing these sentiments to George, he took the initiative and began labeling her drink orders on the napkins underneath them. The two of them established not only a system that they joked about often but also a very close relationship.

The other employees perceived correctly that George was "taking Cheryl under his wing." This information trickled down to Cheryl, to whom the thought had never occurred. Phrases like, "He's so good to you", "You're so lucky", and "I wish I had someone like that when I started" echoed in Cheryl's ears. Soon she began to realize that his helpfulness evoked a strange sense of guilt in her. This guilt peaked one night when a customer made a pass at Cheryl and George came flying from around the bar and grabbed the man. He shoved the man towards the door while Cheryl stood poised with a tray in her hand ready to smack the man in the face. The other waitresses clustered around Cheryl, praising George, and her good fortune to have him as a friend. Cheryl uncomfortably thanked George for his help. Later, George insisted that she accept a ride home because, "she was emotionally distraught from the night's occurrences." Cheryl begrudgingly agreed.

George drove to his apartment and invited Cheryl upstairs. Her first instinct was no, for she had intimations of some type of danger, or unattractive situation. But at his comment, "After all I do for you, sweetheart, can't you even give me the pleasure of your company for a while?", she got out of the car.

The rest of the story need not be told. Cheryl did things that night she never would have done otherwise, for the guilt George evoked in her was tremendously powerful over her mind and consequently her actions.

Many women today, like Cheryl, have experienced similar confrontations with the instrumental guilt that sometimes follows positive sexism. The word "sometimes" appears here because this does not happen to all women. More accurately stated, instrumental guilt does touch most women, but not as seriously as in Cheryl's case.

Cheryl's situation exemplified one of three ways in which positive sexism can be utilized by men. One, it can be the instrument through which a man shows his sincere love for a woman. Two, positive sexism can be a way for a man to get to know a woman, and then unexpectedly, unintentionally, become a manipulative tool for the man. Three, it can be a means to only one desired goal for the man, with absolutely no sincerity behind it.

It is difficult to distinguish between these types of attitudes. However, women must learn to discern the sincere from the insincere. They must change their feelings of guilt to anger, a much more positive force for the woman, and satisfyingly deck the next man who says, "Aw, you mean after that nice dinner you can't even give me one little kiss?". And we all know that the word kiss is subject to many substitutions.

Campus fires are no joke

To the Editor,

We are presently waiting for the fire alarm to go off for possibly the second time tonight. Robes and slippers are strewn carelessly across the floor, ready to be put on again if necessary. The emotional tension is thick and there are a lot of frayed nerves.

Well, Crampton just had what amounts to our fourteenth fire, and we feel that it's a bit of an embarrassment and quite pitiful that the University and the Police Force have achieved nothing in their attempts to apprehend the culprit. The school should be taking further measures to ensure the safety of it's residents; we should be guaranteed safe housing, yet the fires persist. Whether it takes full time guards with assigned posts, or even security cameras, it is obvious that we must go to further extremes than fire and smoke detectors. This person has to be caught-should have been caught.

We are quite angry, frustrated, annoyed, and more than a little scared about the problem at hand. It is absurd that 180 women must suffer from the pranks or sickness of another (or others). Especially when the fires seem to be an inside job most of the time. A dorm should have a community that is close instead of being harassed at all hours of the night.

It has become a common sight to see Crampton residents leaving the dorm during a fire carrying their school books. It takes about 45 minutes for each fire to be put out and to have everyone signed in for the remainder of the night.

Essentially, what we are saying is that further actions of protection should be taken, even if it entails moving some residents temporarily. Fires aren't the most conducive thing for studying, yet we don't want to have to go through further hassles by moving to another dorm, especially when we like the one that we live in now.

Nuclear war can be bad

To the Editor,

WARNING. ABC network has determined that nuclear war is disastrous to your health, an already obvious statement. The film "The Day After" did not consider how to prevent this disaster. For that ABC arranged a panel discussion which would consider alternative solutions to the problem. The line up for the commentary was horrendous. It began with Charles Schultz who advertised for a further U.S. military build-up. A panel discussion followed whose members were all white, older males of whom the majority had held government positions. Only Carl Sagan spoke on the ridiculousness of the arms race and advocated disarmament. On a panel of six this obviously misrepresents the popular support of a nuclear freeze and disarmament. Considering the social implications and the emotional impact of the film the discussion mediated by Ted Koppel was a farce.

Study space in the D.C.'s?

To the Editor,

The Southwest Area Government deserves a great deal of credit for accurately determinig that lack of study space is a serious problem on campus, and doing something about it. The decision to open Berkshire D.C. for nighttime studying makes a lot of sense and Dean Field, Marie Capadonna and Presidents McCarthy and Bean should be congratulated for their efforts.

When I lived in Southwest during the 70's study space was at a premium. I assume that the lighting problems in Goodell and the access problems in the Tower library have only exacerbated the difficulty.

The creation of a new, quiet study area deserves support and utilization by students living in Southwest. If it works, maybe the D.C. will give away coffee.

Washingtoon spoofs politics

By PETER WISSOKER
Collegian Staff

Washingtoon is a reference book about the American political system that is well worth reading. Unfortunately, because it uses the medium that best describes American politics, cartoons, most libraries won't put it on their shelves. Alas, what a shame, for this is the most accurate book on American politics that I've read in a while.

Mark Alan Stamaty's cartoons have been in the Village Voice, sandwiched between Feiffer and Stan Mack's Real Life Funnies (all dialogue guaranteed true) for years, little discussed and little read, probably because there were too many words or because the drawings were imperfect. His first cartoon, MacDoodle Street, ended when all the characters flew off at the end. A few weeks later, Washingtoon appeared.

Washingtoon's central figure is Bob Forehead, the head of the Congressional JFK-Look Alike Conservative Caucus. Bob decided to give up pursuing his dream of becoming a game show host after being enlightened of the burdens of the tycoon sector by Gerard V. Oxboggle, President of the Glominoid Corporation.

Oxboggle, who had seen Bob selling glow in the dark hangers on the Late Late Show, then introduced him to Arthur Giggle, the inventor of the Giggle Wiggle theory of Economics. Giggle's theory is based on the following observation: If you put a layer of Cookie Crumbs on the bottom of a fish tank full of worms then only the worms at the bottom of the tank eat. But, if you dump the crumbs at the very top of the tank, the crumbs trickle down to all layers and all the worms get to eat. Of course, as go the worms, so goes the nation.

The book is full of clever insights into both Washington and the way the American public is manipulated by charisma and intellect. When Bob's public begins to feel that there's no substance behind his buzz word image, his advisors come up with the necessary fuzz words to give Bob the image of having an in-depth perception of the issues.

As Dwight Lidlud, Perceptional Engineer, puts it: "The vast majority of Americans are very upset about our economy. They are also very fuzzy minded about what should be done or even about what exactly is causing the problems. Whenever they try to figure it out they become engulfed in a vast mental fuzziness. Fuzzwords speak to their fuzziness and offer hope. Fuzzwords express concepts that elude the comprehension of the average voter. For instance, Bob might urge a 'non-interventionist monetary policy' or call for the federal Reserve to 'Abandon its targets of aggregates.' If spoken with an air of confident authority, Fuzzwords like these can attract millions of anxious, fuzzminded voters who have lost faith in politicians who use only buzzwords."

The promotional letter that came with the book called the events that take place therein, "zany." I would say that this is a serious insult to a book that should be treated as one of the finest satires to come out in years.

A change in the future is closer than you think.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT

The University Store is...

Temporarily Moving

This temporary move is due to the need to remove asbestos from the ceilings of the University Store and Campus Center Concourse.

In order to minimize disruption of services to the University Community, alternatives have been established by the Campus Center Board of Governors and Staff. The University Store will continue to operate from temporary facilities in the Student Union Building in order to provide necessary and needed goods and services. The following rooms will be used; S.U.B. Ballroom and Cape Cod Lounge. The initial move will be to the Cape Cod Lounge on November 28th. The Store will continue to operate in both locations until the moving process is complete.

Additional study areas will be announced as of November 28th, to accomodate students.

Women's hoop plays tough but loses

By GERRY DiSIMAS
Collegian Staff

Tommy the squirrel sees it all in the Curry Hicks Cage. He was busy scurrying around the top, on the beams and across the netting used by the baseball team in search of his nuts during yesterday's University of Massachusetts—Rhode Island consolation game.

Tommy also saw the UMass women's basketball team go 5-22 last year. Tommy saw a new coach hired from Clark University and he saw the Minutewomen open their 1983-84 season this weekend with two losses, one to UConn, 74-68, in overtime, the other a 77-52 blowout at the hands of URI.

Things change. But not overnight.

Things are changing for the UMass women's basketball team and it showed in Saturday's tough loss to Connecticut. And Sunday's loss to Rhode Island made UMass painfully aware of the things that they have to work on.

"We have to work on our passing," said assistant coach Pat Glispin after the URI game which newly appointed head coach Barbara Stevens missed with a very nasty cold. "And we have to get ready to play aggressive defense and work on our fast break."

"Yesterday (against UConn) we stayed in our game plan," stated Glispin. "Today, URI's aggressive defense disrupted us."

It was the WRam defense that took UMass out of the game forcing numerous turnovers and bad shots late in the first half and early in the second when they outscored UMass 24-5 to take a 40-21 lead after being tied at 16. UMass never recovered.

"They were (URI) the more aggressive team today. We're prone to offensive lapses," said Glispin. "I'm proud (not of the lapses but the team effort) of them," she added quickly. "They don't have the word quit in their vocabulary. The kids played very hard."

Against Connecticut in the tourney semi-finals, UMass stayed with the Huskies and led at the half by a 33-30 margin. However, the Huskies led by the hot shooting of Lori Kulo (21 points) and Leigh Curl (17 pts.), UConn opened up a six point lead with 2:30 to go in the game.

But UMass tied the game and sent it into overtime when high scorer sophomore Barbara Hebel's (29 pts.) jumper hung on the rim for two seconds before falling to tie the score at 62-62.

"We climbed a mountain in the last three minutes," said Stevens on Saturday. "It was a terrific effort."

However in the overtime, a tired and a little sloppy UMass sent UConn to the line and developed a big foul problem. UConn won the game from the charity stripe hitting 12 of 14 to pull out the win.

Hebel was the UMass high scorer in each game with 29 against UConn and 13 vs URI. Karen Damminger sank 11 (UConn) and eight against URI. Wendy Ward, the team's only senior hit for 11 vs the WRams.

New Hampshire won the New England Tip-Off Tournament for the fourth year in a row with a 76-68 win over the stubborn Huskies.

The Minutewomen hosts St. Johns on Tuesday and as Tommy the squirrel would attest to, this weekend was a fine effort but UMass will have to do much better if they hope to top St. Johns.

UM women's soccer got it all back together

HIGH SCORER — Stacey Flionis (above) and fellow seniors Deanna Denault and Mary Szetela led the team to its highest finish ever, 3rd in the nation.

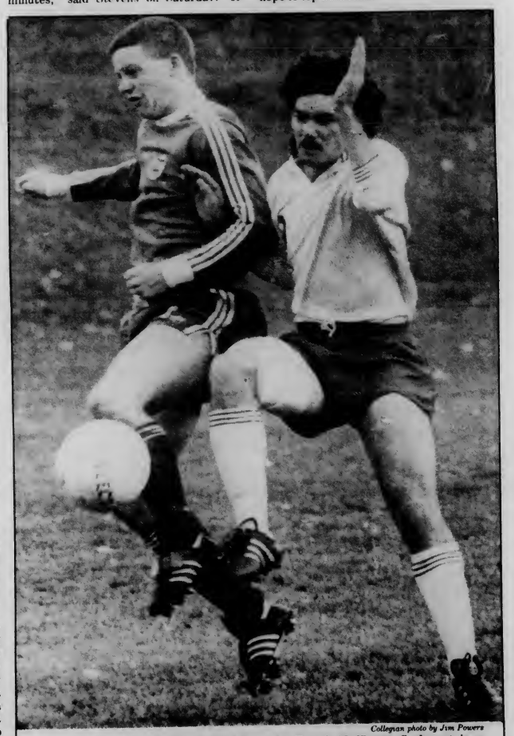
By ELLEN RICHARD
Collegian Staff

The last NCAA and end-of-season women's soccer notes...

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team had a season of ups and downs but played a tough game against defending champion North Carolina and, instead of being disappointed with the 2-0 loss, just happened to be all smiles the next day against the University of Connecticut (a 1-0 win).

UConn, which had defeated UM earlier in the season 1-0, came out against UMass in the consolation game and was thrown a little off balance by the change of five backs, three halfbacks and two forwards to a 4-4-2 lineup. The change was made due to three injuries to the defense and UMass took advantage, or should it be said-took pleasure, in the confusion of UConn.

"They owed us one," Coach Kalekeni Banda said referring to UConn's victory in early October. "We thought, 'Let's go out there and show them and have the last laugh'. They had the first laugh earlier."



Maybe just a touch of revenge was wanted and gotten on the New England rivals. The victory also brought UMass back as Northeast Champs and the team to beat next season. It was the third year in a row that UConn has, shall we say, choked (at the Final Four)-and if you listened hard enough you could hear them coughing all the way over here.

"It was a sweet win," Banda continued. "After we scored the goal there were players falling all over the place. They were jumping all over the place and had to take a break. It was like, 'What a relief.' It was a very emotional game. They never gave up."

Awards Department: Of the three MVP awards given out at the Final Four—offense, defense and all around, - junior forward Chris Taggart received the All Around MVP and rightly deserved it. Banda said, "She gets respect from other teams, this team and me"...Senior tri-captain Stacey Flionis and Nadia Komarowski and Taggart were selected to the All-Tourney Team. Flionis played a skillful game and outran most opponents. Komarowski was second, along with Ellen Taggart for most goals scored (five goals, 11 points)....Against North Carolina, freshman Michelle Rodney and freshman goalie Jeanne Paul received the game balls. "She (Rodney) gives the impression that she doesn't care in practice but when that whistle blows in the game you want to have Michelle in there," Banda said of Rodney. Paul has played "tremendous" all year for UM....Last but not least, Komarowski and Debbie Harackiewicz took the game balls against UConn. Komarowski put the shot in that gave UM the win. Harackiewicz, who missed four games earlier in the year because of a fractured nose, and came back in the quarterfinals to score the goal against Brown which sent UM to Central Florida.

Pain Department: Paul played outstanding in the net and came through when UMass needed her most, but did not have a restful plane flight home. She was walking for most of the flight due to a bad back and could not sit down for more than 15 minutes....Both Rodney and Dennault looked like they were going to sit on the bench with injured Lori Stukes. Neither could put any weight on their ankles. "If you saw them you would have said there was no way they could play tomorrow (against UConn). The trainer said if they played it would be from the bench." But they did....Jamie Watson, who suffered a knee injury mid-season and missed eight remaining games, saw some action due to the depleted squad, as did freshman Martha Ruble who has been ill most of the season....After Stuke's "freak" accident in which no one was near her and she twisted her ankle the wrong way, Banda "just got the girls together at the other side of the field and resumed practice as if nothing happened. Emotionally, we were in control. We were more worried of the severity of the injury."....With three injuries and one ill player, the Minutewomen had only one healthy player to come off the bench—freshman goalie Lisa Ellis....Mary Szetela, Beth Semonik and Kristi Kelly were the only healthy defensemen.

Miscellaneous Department: Banda called Ellen Taggart "the surprise of the camp" in August and she proved herself scoring five goals and two assists for 12 points - second best on the team....Susan Bird played tough all year long while being ill for some of the time. Bird still managed to play in all but one game this season....North Carolina coach said to Banda after his team's 2-0 semifinal win over UM, "Your game was our toughest game of the year."

TOUGH GAME, TOUGH YEAR — As Frank Neffinger finds out in a game this year, no one gave the UMass men's soccer team any respect this fall. UMass and the ten seniors on coach Jeff Gettler's team started the season with high hopes but a lack of offense stifled the team. Injuries also hurt. The defense was very good but didn't get any help. Kevin Flynn stood out on the 3-12-5 that had pre-season playoff hopes. UMass earned their wins by beating Springfield, Westfield St. and North Adams St.

"They're always tough when you don't score," said Gettler at one point this season. Hopefully next year this will be corrected.

NY hammers punchless Pats

NEW YORK (AP) — Richard Todd fired two touchdown passes to Wesley Walker, including a tie-breaking 64-yard bomb in the third period, and the New York Jets beat the punchless New England Patriots 26-3 in a National Football League game Sunday.

A tough New York defense, keyed by three sacks of rookie quarterback Tony Eason by Mark Gastineau, shut down the Patriots' running game which was ranked No. 1 in the NFL and had hurt the Jets earlier in a 23-13 New England victory.

Tony Collins, New England's leading rusher who had a club record 212 yards in the Pats' earlier victory over the Jets, was held to just 22 yards on 18 carries.

Todd's first TD pass to Walker came on that electrifying 64- yarder on the Jets' first possession of the third quarter and broke a 3-3 tie.

People of color have always had to struggle very hard to maintain and foster our organizations on the UMass campus. However, compared to student organizations for people of color on other majority white campuses across New England, we have been very successful in terms of the number, variety, and strength of our organizations.

It is for this reason that we were asked to host the fifth annual Third World Student Leadership Conference this Saturday, Dec. 3 at the Campus Center. Students of color from all over New England and New York have been invited to attend and participate in the conference designed to address the issues, concerns and needs of Third World organizations.

There will be a full day of activities featuring workshops, a "meet the people" luncheon, presentations and a keynote address by author James Baldwin. A formal constitution for the New England Third World Students Alliance will be presented, reviewed and formalized.

The success of this conference depends upon the attendance and participation of UMass and Five College Third World students. If you are a member of a Third World organization, this will be an excellent opportunity to meet with other organizations to discuss strategies and exchange ideas. If you are not a member of a Third World organization, it is an even better opportunity to learn more about these organizations and find out how they can benefit you and vice-versa.

This conference is important not only in building unity with Third World organizations throughout New England, but in rebuilding unity in the community right here at UMass. It is interesting to note that this year we have the largest Third World first-year class in history. However, the number of freshpersons involved in our organizations is the lowest it has ever been.

Third World organizations are here for the good of all students. This conference is an opportunity for us to grow and organize; and we must take advantage of it.

Many of the students who come up for the conference will be spending the entire weekend. Any students willing to share their room with the visiting sisters and brothers, call 545-0031 to make arrangements.

The following is a list of activities taking place. Please try to attend and bring a friend:

James Baldwin will be the keynote speaker at the Third World Student Leadership Conference on Saturday, Dec. 3.

Question: Do people who use the phrase Third World really understand the origin and connotations it denotes. This article is timely and important because most people of color, progressive and non-progressive permit others to put them into numerical digits that negates being first. It is serious and dangerous for a people to continue to use Third World without investigating its origin.

Charles De Gaulle first used the phrase when he had to give a report to the then European power block of the world. De Gaulle was apologizing for losing the war to Bro. Ho Chi Minh in North Vietman. The white countries of the world at that time were afraid of the outcome of people of color really controlling their own destiny. Back in the early 50's one could see the eventual fight between the Soviet Union and The Republic of China. The struggles of Mao Tse-Tung is a prime example of people of color organizing among themselves to fight against the powers of Europe.

People of color must realize their potential as oppressed people and become critical thinkers. A lot of progressive people think the term Third World is acceptable because of Franz Fanon, the African psychiatrist who used the phrase in his two major books, "The Wretched of the Earth" and "Black Skin White Mask." People of color soon forgot this brother's contradictions that he eventually admitted to in "The Wretched of the Earth." He did not support the oppressed Africans in Algeria until he came to the conclusion that there was a war going on between the Oppressed and the Oppressor; and then had to decide like other Freedom Fighters who desire freedom from the common oppressor who they will support. Bro. Frantz came to his conclusion almost too late; he had treated many French soldiers for their emotional problems they received from killing and emotionally defeating the oppressed Africans.

People of color must begin to see that language is a large part of their oppression. Today in the U.S. and other parts of the world oppressed people have not yet realized that they hold the balance of power in the world today. People of color must refute the phrase Third World. In an precedented show of force the U.S. stepped upon Grenada the little ant on Oct. 25th. In attempting to justify the act of aggression and the flagrant disregard for local and international laws, President Reagan retreated to the usual red-baiting, so prevalent in American society.

However, he was not confident that red-baiting would be enough so he took further measures. First he claimed that lives of U.S. nationals were threatened, in spite of direct assurances from the great majority of U.S. nationals residing on the island, and assurances from the Grenadian government that no harm would come to the Americans on Grenada.

In an even more stupendous manner President Reagan stated that among the reasons for the invasion is the fact that he was invited to invade Grenada by Caribbean leaders such as: Prime Minister Adams, of Barbados; Prime Minister Charles of Dominica and certainly not least among the "apostles," Seaga, of Jamaica.

When the President appeared before the American public to announce the invasion, he made mention of the fact that his actions were in response to an appeal for help from the organization of Eastern Caribbean states (O.E.C.S). What he neglected to relay to the American public however, is the fact that of the group of nations which allegedly invited him to invade Grenada two were not members of the O.E.C.S., namely Barbados and Jamaica. He also neglected to relay to the American public that such an invitation violated the charter of that body, which calls for a unanimous vote of agreement before any such action can legally take place. He also failed to inform the American public that the pact signed by the group of nations which form the O.E.C.S. was a pact never ratified by the United Nations and therefore not recognized by any international or for that matter, regional body.

One would think that these were but a few minor details overlooked by the President and his advisors in their zest to restore "order and democracy" to a country which both Carter and Reagan over the past four and a half years consistently and systematically refused to recognize.

These are but a few of the long list of facts denied the American public, on whose behalf President Reagan acted. Among the claims advanced by the president is that of the closing of Grenada to the outside world on Monday, Oct. 24, the day before the invasion. There was indeed a closing which made it impossible for Americans to leave Grenada by air, but that closing was not based on the island of Grenada. Instead, the closing originated on the Island of Barbados, again, one of the nations of which the president claimed to have invited him to invade Grenada.

The above brings to light an interesting issue, one that made the airport being constructed on the island of Grenada one of the world's most renowned airports. One may recall a little more than a year ago President Reagan appeared on national television showing photographs of the airport under construction in Grenada. At that point President Reagan charged that the airport was intended for Cuban-Soviet military purposes. He also posited the notion that an island as small as Grenada had no legitimate need for an airport with a 9,000 ft. runway capacity; this he claimed was proof that the facility was to be for the exportation of revolution in the region.

What the president neglected to point out to the American public was that Grenada without the capacity of the airport under construction was totally dependent on Barbados' Grantely Adams International Airport for its air service since the existing Grenada airstrip, Pearl, has only the capacity to land small aircrafts. Ironically it was the closing of that air link between Barbados and Grenada which jerked the panic button in Washington, resulting in the Oct. 25th U.S. invasion. How very coincidental?

Yet that was not the only thing President Reagan failed to bring to the attention of the American public. He failed to bring to the attention of the American public the following: that the plan for an international airport on the island of Grenada was a 20-yr. old dream finally being realized. Since the end of the second world war Britain had recognized such a need, but backed down from the project because of worsening economic conditions in Britain. That Aruba, with only 75 square miles has a 9,000 ft. runway. That, Antigua, 108 sq. miles has a 9,000 ft. runway. That, Bar-

MEP: Engineers of Success

by Segun Eubanks
Nummo Staff

The engineering program at the University of Massachusetts is one of the most difficult and intense majors around. This can be especially true for many Third World students. Nine years ago a group of Black students and faculty realized the problem and began a program to recruit, retain and place Third World engineering students after graduation.

Today the Minority Engineering Program (MEP) offers academic counseling, tutorial assistance and workshops to help students of color successfully complete the engineering program.

"The administration had been ignoring Black engineering students," said Dwight Travada, assistant director of MEP. "The public schools are still not doing the job of preparing minority students in math and science."

Travada also said that the public school systems often discourage minorities from higher level subjects and therefore the students are not motivated to take the classes.

"We begin on the junior high school level and try to give students motivation and create more positive images about math and science," said Travada.

As part of MEP's recruitment campaign, they run a summer program, the Engineering Career Orientation (ECO). The program consists of testing, math classes and workshops featuring speakers from private industry. It is, along with all of MEP's services, free to students.

Working with Admissions is another important phase of MEP recruitment. "We help students who normally wouldn't be accepted, to gain admission to the university," said Travada.

Once the first year students are accepted, many of them participate in an MEP summer program called the Minority Engineering Freshmen Orientation (MEFO). The students come to UMass two weeks prior to the start of the semester and take basic calculus, chemistry and physics classes. Travada explained, "This gives the student an academic head start and a chance to get adjusted to the university."

The program has proved to be very successful because students who participate tend to do much better first semester than those who did not participate.

MEP's main priority is retention of students once they reach the university. They coordinate activities and workshops with other programs and offer students academic, financial and personal counseling. "Working with CCEBMS and BCP has been very beneficial," said Travada. MEP has been very successful, recently graduating its largest class in June and bringing in its largest first-year class in September.

"Minority engineers are very much in demand," said Travada. Although Affirmative Action guidelines are part of the reason, private industry is beginning to realize that minority students are just as competent as white students. Travada said, "Many minorities have to go through a lot more which can make them work harder than the average worker."

A degree in engineering could also lead to a career in business, law or the medical field; therefore MEP strongly encourages its graduates to pursue master's degrees. "We want our graduates to be in decision-making management positions," said Travada.

MEP is unique in that a good portion of its funding comes from private industry. This year the National Action Council for Minority Engineering granted 12 freshperson scholarships of up to $1,000. MEP is also funded by the U.S. Department of Energy; one of only 15 schools to receive those funds.

Many of the 205 students of MEP are very involved in the program. The students are now trying to reorganize the Society for Third World Scientists and Engineering, a student organization that dissipated a few years ago. The first-year students began an organization called Minority Engineers (ME) and the women in the program are members of the National Society of Women Engineers.

Director of MEP, Reynolds Winslow, and Travada, offer students as much support as possible, but, as Travada said, "The students must want to be successful." He said that all MEP can do is to make the student "think." "Most of our students are very intelligent," said Travada, "but the key to success is determination." The record proves that many of MEP's students have that key.

Painting the ABC's of American Living

"Charlie" Chin will perform a one-person show entitled, "ABC: American Born Chinese."

The Third World Theater closes its fall season on Dec. 2, 1983, with "ABC: American Born Chinese," a one-man performance by veteran actor "Charlie" Chin, in UMass' Bowker Auditorium at 8 p.m.

"ABC" paints a picture with music and monologue illustrating the experience of American born Chinese versus foreign born Chinese. The 'ABC' have adopted many American values, yet retain important ties to their mother culture. "ABC" satirizes popular stereotypes and corrects common generalizations. The show is a celebration of life and survival against many odds.

"Charlie" Chin has been playing banjo and guitar, singing, writing, composing, acting and teaching for over twenty years. He recently recorded an album, "Back to Back," with Chris Iijima on the East West World Records Label. He is a published poet and has appeared in several professional theatrical productions including the Broadway and national touring company, "Pacific Overtures."

The day following the performance will be a free workshop entitled "Twelve Years of Asian-American Performance," Dec. 2, 2 p.m., Emily Dickenson Hall, Hampshire College.

Tickets are $2.00 for students and $3.00 for the general public. Tickets may be obtained Monday-Friday between 10 a.m.-4 p.m. from the Fine Arts Center Box Office or at the door the evening of the performance.

A supervised child care space is available free by reservation by calling 545-0190, Monday-Friday between 9 a.m.-5 p.m. the week prior to the performance.

The Electric Side of A Legend

by Rich Thorpe

Miles Davis is star people. His electric side has come back suddenly revitalized by a new energy, a marriage to Cicely Tyson and much improved health. This album marks a point in his career where the blues means a great deal. You could say that "Star People" is an omage to the city of St. Louis, a city of blues. There is no Jean Pierre here. No sing-songy, weak playing from the man. His horn rings true, loud and clear, the notes, sparce and few-between, but the meaning all the more accented.

This recording, the third since his six-year absence from the industry (and subsequent return in 1981), is his best; almost as powerful and influential as some of the earlier electric Miles material. Although I prefer to listen to Miles perform straight-ahead jazz, this record is certainly a joy to hear. Music fans will certainly get a thrill out of the mixture in the album: jazz, funk, rock, blues. His band has changed somewhat, but those changes only strengthen the music.

Tom Barney has replaced phenom Marcus Miller as regular bassist and both John Scofield and Mike Stern share the guitar work.

Surprise number two: Miles plays keyboards! Hard to imagine, but on the lp's title track he solos at the beginning and two-thirds of the way through. While he doesn't play like a Herbie Hancock, it is sufficient; enough to suit the purpose.

Side one contains three songs, "Come Get It," "It Gets Better" and "Speak." "Come Get It" retains a strong blues-funk bass line, explosive drums and percussion with Mile's horn and keyboard accents. "It Gets Better" is slower in tempo and features very nice guitar work by Scofield. "Speak" is more rock in its approach and the keyboards add an eerieness which translates into total kinetic energy. Miles and Bill Evans (sax) combine to create a strong horn section.

Side two contains my favorite piece, the title track, "Star People." More than in any other composition the blues is not only present, it sticks out like a sore thumb. As soon as you hear it you'll know. Two fine guitar solos, reminiscent of blues great B.B. King, are performed by Mike Stern. "U' n' I" is a little funky tune that even sounds uplifting and happy. Perhaps this is an indication that Miles isn't through yet. "Star People" is the final work. It is a piece dedicated to Cicely Tyson, Mile's wife and inspiration.

"Star People" is definitely worth making the trip to the record store. The musicianship is tighter and more cohesive than ever before and many fans and non-fans should grow to appreciate the electric side of a man who has had such a profound effect on the music world.

As a sign of total disagreement and disgust of US foreign and military action of the past two months, will any country comtemplate boycotting the 1984 Summer Olympics to be held in Los Angeles, California, USA? Can the US avoid beeing accused of increasing its imperialist actions as the USSR was in its invasion of Afganistan in December 1979?

Who will lead the Third World countries and countries of the West in the boycott of the 1984 Olympics as the US led the other countries of the world in 1980?

It would be of great interest to see if any country will show its disapproval of the US military actions by boycotting the 1984 Olympics.

What is to be done when any nation, democratic or not, challenges international law and national sovereignty by forced invasion onto a foreign nation?

The American Olympic team should lead the rest of the world in boycotting the 1984 games in order to demostrate against increased US militarism.

bados, 166 sq. miles has an 11,000 ft. runway. That, Curacau, 171 sq. miles has a 13,000 ft. runway. That St. Kitts, 65 sq. miles has a 9,000 ft. runway. That St. Marten, 27 sq. miles has a 9,000 ft. runway.

Of course President Reagan in his infinite wisdom would and did lead the American public to believe that Grenada, an island of 133 sq. miles was embarking upon an unusual path when it too decided to consruct a 9,000 ft. runway. But that is only scratching the surface of inconsistency in President Reagan's treatment of the Grenadian people. Not for one minute in his talks with the American public would President Reagan ackowledge the fact that the construction of the Grenadian airport was being done by anyone else but Cubans. He failed to even allow a slip of the tongue to mention the fact that funding for the airport came largely from NATO allies and Third World countries. Even worse, he failed to point to the fact that the U.S. firm, Layne Dredging Ltd. held a seven million dollar contract with the Grenadians to do work on the airport.

The impunity with which President Reagan handled the airport controvercy trickled over into his handling of the Oct. 25th invasion of that island. His actions can best be characterized as cruel and unusual punishment - for the Grenadian people who dared to assert their rights to "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness." As such, if Grenada posed any threat it was it's daring to assert these rights which we in the U.S. so proudly espouse; indeed this is what prompted the invasion. An act well-documented and proven to be nothing less than calculated, premeditated and cold-blooded. History will never forgive "American the Great" for its treatment of the 120,000 inhabitants of that island.

President John F. Kennedy in his 1961 Inaugural Address said the following: "...the same revolutionary beliefs for which our forebearers fought are still at issue around the globe...We dare not forget today that we are are the heirs of that first revolution."

Judging from the action of President Reagan on the now historic day of Oct. 25, and the American public's response, Americans have indeed forgotten, or have chosen to conveniently forget that theirs was the first revolution that would set into motion the long chains of revolution that have since taken place.

Contrary to those who buy the notion that revolutions in the Third World are externally motivated, revolution will continue to occur until every mouth is fed, every naked is clothed, every illiterate is learned, and every sick is cared for. No amount of neutron bombs, Cruise missiles, or whatever the latest weaponery may be, will thwart revolutions from erupting from the bosom of the oppressed. Failure to recognize this truism is failure to lead the road to progress for all humanity.

House approves bill that may raise fees $20

By JOHN O'CONNELL
Collegian Staff

A bill which will extend the authority and borrowing capacity of the University of Massachusetts Building Authority and raise student fees passed unanimously through the Massachusetts House of Representatives Monday.

The bill extends the Building Authority's powers to the Worcester campus in order to build an $11 million parking garage there, and allows the authority to raise its borrowing ceiling to pay for $22 million worth of renovations on campus buildings, including $2 million for renovations to the Curry Hicks Cage.

Student Government Association leaders have opposed the bill because it could raise student fees at the Amherst campus by $20 and more per year, SGA Public Policy Committee Chair Paul Gosselin said.

Rep. James Collins, D-Amherst, said he thinks the bill is a good idea and expects the bill will be acted on in the next week or so in the Senate.

The 1983 legislative session is expected to wind up in four or five days, and Gosselin said he fears "a late night session where they push all the bills through."

The bill, proposed by University President David C. Knapp and filed by Gov. Michael E. Dukakis, raises the bonding, or borrowing, ceiling from $80 million to $100 million within the UMass Building Authority, to finance the $33 million project.

Parking garage at the Worcester Medical Center will create 1,200 critically needed parking spaces, the bill states, and $22 million will pay for "long overdue deferred maintenance to certain buildings of the Authority constructed on the Amherst campus including code improvements — i.e. fire, safety, handicapped architectural barriers, recreational facility and other capital projects."

The bill also proposes to finance the project without increasing costs to students, but SGA co-President Charlene Allen said the bill will end up raising student fees because the only way to pay off building authority bonds is through student fees.

Cindy Lehmbeck, chair of the senate Committee on Rents and Fees, said the bill sets a precedent, whereby students are seen as an easy funding source for campus construction projects.

The bill also states that the Worcester parking garage should pay for itself with a $1.25 daily fee, but Gosselin said it will not happen.

"I think it's outlandish to extend the authority (to Worcester) and then fund a project that's unfeasible," he said.

Note warns Crampton of fire fourteen

By PAUL BASKEN
Collegian Staff

The series of arsons at Crampton Dormitory wasted little time in resuming after Thanksgiving break, with the 14th fire this semester having been predicted in messages scrawled in red magic marker in and around the all-women dormitory.

According to dormitory residents who waited for more than two hours in a chilling drizzle to re-enter their rooms, the 3:12 p.m. fire alarm was pulled during a search of the building by residents who were prompted by threats written with a red marker on a roll of toilet paper in a ground-floor stall, to "kill Crampton."

A note written with the same marker inside of the stall's door specified "arson time 2:01 p.m. noon (sic) November 28, 1983," said 20-year-old Rosalee Abbott, a junior nutrition major from Newton. She said she reported both messages immediately after seeing them to her floor's resident assistant, who in turn said she called the police.

The resident assistant, Joyce Sumpter, said the police were on their way to respond to her call when the fire alarm rang out.

However, State Police Trooper Jay Bowman, who was in the building during the investigation following the fire, said he found no written threats anywhere in the building, and refused further comment altogether.

Meanwhile, a group of three Crampton residents continued circulating among fellow residents waiting next door in Prince Dormitory a petition they planned to present to Housing Services today demanding a full refund of their board fee for this semester.

"If we don't get money back, (then) we would like something added to our curriculum," said 19-year-old Lori LeBrun, a sophomore exercise science major from North Andover, who admitted their proposal had little chance of being realized, but said she was working to let people know "our grades are suffering."

"We're getting harassed by the police," said LeBrun, adding that she feels the four-hour wait they had before returning to their rooms following the previous fire last Tuesday. "We're all suspects...there's alot of tension among friends."

Rally coincides with registration drive

By JOHN O'CONNELL
and JOE SHARTRAND
Collegian Staff

Students conducting a voter registration drive today hope to register 500 to 600 University of Massachusetts students to vote in Amherst this year.

Fran Pheeny, a member of the Undergraduate Student Senate's Public Policy Committee, said six voter registrars will be present at a table the committee set up in the Campus Center concourse today.

Pheeny said she will speak at the nuclear freeze rally featuring Alan Cranston, D-Calif., at 2 p.m. in the Student Union Ballroom to "link the significance of the power people have with their vote to influence things like the nuclear freeze."

A voter registration drive conducted during a nuclear freeze rally last fall registered more than 1,200 students, the largest one-day voter registration drive in Massachusetts history, Pheeny said.

That rally featured Democratic U.S. Sen. Edward Kennedy from Massachusetts, singers James Taylor and Peter Yarrow, then-candidate for Governor Michael Dukakis and actress Lauren Bacall, and drew thousands of students. Six hundred registrants will be considered successful this year because the speakers at this year's rally are not quite as popular a draw, Pheeny said.

"It's one of the objectives of the Public Policy Committee to get people to participate in the political system," she said.

The committee will be handing out copies of a pamphlet which rates state legislators according to their voting records on student-related bills at the voter registration table.

The publication, For the Record, "is designed to dispel the myth that individuals cannot make a difference in the legislative process," writes Public Policy Committee Chair Paul Gosselin, in the pamphlet.

He said, "(The committee) is a watchdog in the State House (for students)."

The committee has filed bills to put students on the Board of Regents of Higher Education and the UMass Building Authority and to use Shoplifting Fines from the University Store for financial aid.

State Senators and Representatives are rated, in For the Record, from zero to 100 percent according to their voting records on 19 bills filed since 1979, ranging from student scholarships and the state education budget to tenant's rights and the death penalty.

Amherst Rep. James Collins, House chair of the Joint Committee on Education is rated 83 percent favorably, while Amherst Sen. John Olver is rated at 93 percent on votes recorded in the pamphlet.

"Students should remember that these elected officials were placed in office to serve the needs of their constituents," Gosselin writes in the pamphlet. "As students, we must take an active role in government to insure that the needs of students are maintained."

China protests Congressional bill

PEKING (AP) — Two measures in the U.S. Congress that support Taiwan have disturbed Chinese-U.S. relations and cast some doubt on President Reagan's plans to visit China in April.

Reagan is expected to sign an appropriations bill, passed by Congress in mid-November, which backs Communist China's application to join the Asian Development Bank. But the bill also says that Taiwan - which still claims to be the legitimate government of all China - should remain a full member of the bank.

The vote prompted a formal protest from the Chinese government on Nov. 25, the second in a week, warning of "grave consequences" for relations with the United States.

Nicaraguan official denied U.S. visa

MANAGUA, Nicaragua (AP) — The government newspaper said Monday that Interior Minister Tomas Borge will visit the United States this week as planned, but the U.S. Embassy said he had not been been granted a visa.

"We are still awaiting authorization to issue the visa," embassy spokesman Gilbert Callaway said.

Another embassy official, who asked not to be identified for security reasons, said, "Borge's case is not being studied by the State Department but directly by the White House, which will decide whether to grant Borge a visa."

The United States has denied the interior minister a visa on two previous occasions, but U.S. Ambassador Anthony Quainton said last week he did not anticipate any problem in getting authorization for Borge's visit this time.

Israel wants greater U.S. presence

WASHINGTON (AP) - Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir raised Israeli proposals with President Reagan on Monday to strengthen U.S.-Israeli military and economic ties and to counter what both nations say is a Soviet-backed threat in Lebanon.

U.S. and Israeli officials said they expected agreement on closer military cooperation, such as building a U.S. arms depot in Israel and joint military exercises, as a signal to Syria and its Soviet sponsors that they won't be given a free hand in Lebanon.

After an initial 20-minute meeting with Reagan and his key advisers in the Oval Office, Shamir told reporters that he had "very friendly and good talks."

A second meeting between the two leaders was scheduled for today, preceding the arrival in Washington on Wednesday of Lebanese President Amin Gemayel, who also is expected to seek more U.S. aid.

Marines uninjured in Beirut attack

BEIRUT, Lebanon (AP) - U.S. jets thundered over Beirut Monday after two overnight attacks on American Marines, and gunners shelled the capital's harbor for the first time since the summer of 1982.

In Tripoli, besieged PLO chief Yasser Arafat accused Syria of massing troops near the port city.

The American jets flew reconnaissance sorties over Beirut and nearby hills after the attacks on Marine positions. The shooting caused no casualties to the Marines and only minor damage to the Beirut airport where the Marines are stationed.

But the 15-minute bombardment of the port wounded four construction workers shortly after noon. Police were unable to determine who was responsible for the first shelling of the harbor area since Israel's 1982 summer invasion of Lebanon.

One salvo of five shells and rockets slammed into the harbor area about a mile east of the U.S. Embassy on West Beirut's seafront.

"Nothing fell close enough to alarm us," said embassy spokesman John Stewart.

Alaskan warms kids' Hannukah

LOS ANGELES (AP) — During his childhood in Massachusetts, Dan Bloom felt confused because the schools and stores didn't celebrate Hanukkah, and he couldn't write to Santa Claus for presents.

Now, at 34, Bloom is helping Jewish children enjoy Hanukkah while other children are celebrating Christmas.

From his home in Nome, Alaska, Bloom is answering letters from Jewish children who are writing to him because Hebrew traditions forbid belief in Santa Claus.

Two years ago, Bloom created Bubbie and Zadie — two retired furriers who live in Alaska and love to write letters to children. Their names are Yiddish for grandmother and grandfather.

Last year, Bloom received more than 2,000 letters to Bubbie and Zadie, and answered every one, he said in an interview with the Los Angeles Herald-Examiner.

"Dear Bubbie and Zadie," one child wrote. "Please explain to my sister, Michelle, why we don't have a Christmas tree."

Workers refuse Greyhound's offer

WASHINGTON (AP) — Members of the Amalgamated Transit Union have voted overwhelmingly to reject the latest Greyhound offer to settle a bitter strike, a union official said Monday.

Rex Hardesty, a spokesman for the AFL-CIO here, revealed the vote as representatives of the union were meeting with reporters in Phoenix, Ariz., home base of Greyhound.

According to Hardesty, 9,181 union members voted to reject the new offer, while only 335 voted in favor of it. That represented a margin of 96.4 percent voting against the strike.

School drug busts may be illegal

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Supreme Court said Monday it will decide whether drugs seized from public school students in illegal searches by teachers or administrators may be used as evidence when the students stand trial.

The justices voted to hear arguments that searches by public school teachers or administrators are exempt from the "exclusionary rule" banning illegally seized evidence from criminal trials.

Shore's Pac-Man packs its bags

MARSHFIELD (AP) — Merchants plan to get rid of the 50 or so video games sprinkled around this South Shore town to comply with a U.S. Supreme Court ruling Monday, but residents say they don't expect much of an outcry.

"That's what they decided so we'll have to get rid of them," said Debbie Vetra, whose family runs Seaside Groceries, one of nine businesses that challenged the ban. "I think it's kind of ridiculous."

On Monday, the U.S. Supreme Court refused to hear arguments that the town's ban on video games violates free-speech rights of would-be players, saying the case lacked "a substantial federal question."

Ms. Vetra said the four electronic games in the general store are used mostly by children under 14. "They're in here every day after school," she said. "They'll miss them. But it won't stop them from playing. They can go to Hanover or Plymouth."

The decision let stand a June State Supreme Court ruling upholding the ban on the grounds that the games are "in essence, only technologically advanced pinball machines." The coined-fed beeping and blinking machines have remained in operation while the case wound its way through the courts.

Shamie challenges Tsongas' seat

BOSTON (AP) — Republican Ray Shamie, saying he could better represent working men and women of Massachusetts than U.S. Sen. Paul Tsongas, formally announced Monday he would oppose Tsongas in the 1984 election.

"I understand the problems of the working men and women. I'm a working stiff, too," Shamie told supporters at the Marriott Hotel in downtown Springfield.

"In the tradition of Democratic concern for working men and women, in the tradition of Democratic concern for a strong America, this is one Republican who is more of a Democrat than you are, Mr. Tsongas," he said.

Shamie, 62, who became a millionaire by founding two high technology firms, traveled by airplane in freezing rain from his home in Walpole to Springfield to launch his campaign. He then departed for similar events in New Bedford and Boston.

Century-old women's event celebrated locally

By MICHELLE HYDE
Collegian Staff

Planning begins Tuesday at the University of Massachusetts for the International Women's Event, the only international holiday dedicated to celebrating the strength of women and their contribution to society.

International Women's Event, a series of programs and events pertaining to women's issues, has been a tradition at UMass since its beginning in 1971 for celebrating International Women's Day, March 8, said Mindy Chateauvert, a member of the coalition organizing this year's event.

International Women's Day is held in honor of demonstrations by women factory workers more than 100 years ago who protested unfair working conditions, women's inability to vote, and low pay, Chateauvert said.

At the International Socialist Convention in 1911, Clara Zetkin, a socialist and leader the German women's movement, proposed celebrating the demonstrations internationally by scheduling annual activities on this day.

Chateauvert said International Women's Day has more of an international context than a feminist one, and said every year there are celebrations in China, Russia, the United States, Mexico and France.

There are about five women helping to organize the event so far, but according to Chateauvert, Andrea Bates, another IWE organizer, said more people will show an interest at their meeting tonight in the Campus Center.

The UMass International Women's Event is being sponsored and subsidized this year by the Student Committee for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA), the Student Government Association, the Commuter Collective, and the Distinguished Visitors Program, Bates said.

Bates said that since planning of IWE is still in its preliminary stages, the group does not know if this year's event will take the form of a celebration, as it did last year, or whether it will be a political conference.

Bates said she sees the event as a celebration of the diversity of women and of the progress the women's movement has made since the early 1900s, and as a means to educate the UMass community about women's concerns.

Chateauvert said, "This is the one day of the year when, no matter what women are doing, whether they are working within a social group, everybody has a chance to become involved (in the women's movement)."

The first organizational meeting for International Women's Event '84 will be held Tuesday from 7 to 9 p.m. in room 801, Campus Center.

Project proposes prizes for bus and bus-stop art

By LARRY BOUCHIE
Collegian Correspondent

University of Massachusetts art students will be eligible to receive a $200 stipend and have their art work displayed in a local PVTA bus shelter, if their idea is accepted by the Arts Project.

The Arts Project, a non-profit corporation that supports area artists and works toward better public education of art, is accepting submissions from artists to create art installations for ten PVTA bus shelters in the Northampton-Amherst area.

Jane Axelrod, director of the Arts Project, said the contest is open to all artists.

"The project is open to video, graphics, photography, theater, and mixed-media artists. We'd like to see a lot of student submissions," Axelrod said.

Funding for the project came from a $1500 grant from the Amherst Arts Lottery council. "The Arts Project will provide a matching $1500 and up to ten artists will receive the stipend if their idea is accepted," Axelrod said.

"The project was advertised beginning in mid-October in area newspapers and radio spots. So far we've had about 100 inquiries and some people have already submitted their designs. We will be accepting proposals until January 1," Axelrod said.

Accepted designs will be publicly displayed in May and Arts Project staff will then assist the artists in the execution of their ideas into the designated bus shelters.

In addition to the financial stipend given accepted artists the poject will also offer greater exposure for the artist and will further encourage public interaction with art, Axelrod said.

"Also, depending on the success we have with this project, we may have the opportunity to continue next year and expand to further shelters," Axelrod said. "This is our trial year."

Artists who are interested may contact Jane Axelrod, P.O. Box 564, Northampton, Mass., 01061 or call her at 268-3148.

Benzie, 33, dies of coronary

A married 33 year-old University of Massachusetts student and father of a 9 month-old son died Saturday of a heart attack.

Andrew D. Benzie, a 16-year resident of Amherst currently of 22 Riverglade Drive, was transported by ambulance to Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton at 6:02 a.m. for a reported blood clot near his heart, according to Amherst Police.

He died of a heart attack and the bursting of an artery, according to the Amherst Funeral Home. An autopsy was not performed and the hospital and district attorney refused comment.

A spokesman for the funeral home said the deceased had visited a doctor the day before, who claimed Benzie was in fine health.

Benzie, born Aug. 9, 1950 in Boston, was a candidate for a second degree in computer science. He received a Bachelor of Arts degree from UMass in 1973, and was a 1968 graduate of Lincoln-Sudbury High School.

Benzie leaves his wife, Rickie Ellen Newman, orginally of Great Barrington; a son, Ryan; parents George Benzie and Margaret L. Dickenson, of Sudbury; and a sister, Allison Provenener of Marlborough.

Funeral services were held Monday morning at Amherst Funeral Home, with the retired Rev. John Balcom presiding. Benzie is buried in Wildwood Cemetery in Amherst.

Wilkinson to resign after 8 years

The resignation of Thomas O. Wilkinson, dean of the faculty of Social and Behavioral Sciences in the College of Arts and Sciences for eight years, is now before Chancellor Joseph D. Local bar may face charges

An East Pleasant Street tavern may be charged with liquor license violations after two men were seen drinking there after-hours this weekend, police said.

Amherst Police reported Monday that a community service officer observed two men drinking in the bar at 3:30 a.m. Sunday. The officer further observed that the bar's front door was locked.

Amherst Police Detective John F. Burns said that liquor license laws prohibit anyone (even owners) from drinking in a licensed establishment after 1 a.m. He added that the case is still under investigation, but that charges will "probably" be made. Burns said the owners of the bar would have to face the Amherst Select Board if charges are made.

Chief of Police Donald Maia said that he would not release the name of the bar until the investigation is completed.

The Thanksgiving weekend was very quiet otherwise, police said, with only two arrests, and no arrests for driving while intoxicated.

A 17-year-old man was arrested at 8:50 p.m. Friday and charged with transporting alcohol while under 20. A South Deerfield boy, 15, was arrested at 10:37 p.m. Thursday and charged with operating without headlights or a driver's license.

The proposed renovation of the Curry Hicks Cage, which includes new seats and floor, improved sight lines and a glass-enclosed lobby, Gosselin said, "Is not even worth the money they're paying."

Lehmbeck said the renovations will not increase the seating capacity of the cage, and will provide only cosmetic changes to the 52 year old building.

Students have also opposed the $20 million renovations on campus buildings, mostly in dormitories, claiming that students would end up paying for mistakes and corruption in state building contracts in the past.

Nicaraguan posters dramatic

NICARAGUA: IMAGES OF THE REVOLUTION
Through Dec. 2
Augusta Savage Gallery, New Afrika House

By NINA ELIASOPH
Collegian Correspondent

An exhibit in the Augusta Savage Gallery, in the New Afrika House, (through Dec. 2) challenges us to overcome our preconceptions about revolution. "Nicaragua: Images of the Revolution" is a collection of posters gathered by a UMass student who recently returned from a five-month stay in that country. The posters were made for display in public places--streets, clinics, schools--by diverse groups, including labor unions, church organizations, student's and women's groups, independent and government newspapers, and government departments. Through a mix of visual and verbal messages, the posters make clear their purpose of not just decorating the streets, but also of educating. It is a non-consumerist kind of advertising, with a budget of thousands of dollars rather than the multi-billions spent yearly by our advertisers.

Some of the most dramatic images in the show form a photo-collage series on newsprint recounting some of the many U.S. invasions of Nicaragua. The last invasion, of 1926, gave rise to the situation which was finally overthrown in 1979: the Marines, occupying the country from 1926-1933, assembled and armed the National Guard, initially an official U.S. police force, and installed Anastasio Somoza, father of the deposed dictator who fled in 1979. Since the U.S. backed "contras" who have been entering Nicaragua from Honduras to attack civilians are mainly ex-National Guardsmen, and since most Nicaraguans lost relatives in the long war against the Guard, reading the history in these posters must resonate very powerfully with the emotions of all Nicaraguans. The images in the photo-collages show Marines clutching the sawed-off heads of Nicaraguans, piles of garbage and skulls strewn across a street, bleeding heads: images that would seem to be from horror movies to us, who have not seen such terror in our own lives. One of these stark posters cries, "Never again!"

Hope illuminates other posters: a delicate watercolor showing a dove and the head of Sandino (assassinated hero from the 1930's rebellions against the U.S. occupation) emerging from a volcano, saying, "Sandino lives in those who struggle for peace", a luminous image of a woman and a man keeping night watch with a quote from the Bible (this being a church group's poster).

An exhibit like this illustrates strongly the idea that visual messages are not necessarily cross-cultural; that is, a work of art that might bring people in one society to tears might not have the same effect on people in another society. At first glance these posters might leave a North American with the rather dry feeling of having read a newspaper filled with miracles and horrors, all seemingly incomprehensible. If we try to put ourselves in the shoes of the typical Nicaraguan, poor, perhaps newly literate, who probably lost relatives in the war for national sovereignty, who has seen dramatic improvements (as documented in these statistics-filled posters) in health care, housing, child care, access to food for the poor, political and cultural freedom--if we put ourselves in her or his shoes, then we will open ourselves to experience the emotionally charged content of these beautiful posters.

NRBQ
Friday, November 18
Rusty Nail

By SHEILA CLINTON
Collegian Correspondent

If you have never been to an N.R.B.Q. show, put it on the top of your list of things to do in the Happy Valley. The band is a legend locally and after seeing them once you'll understand why. The New Rhythm and Blues Quartet has been playing together since 1968, and while they have not yet achieved great commercial success, their following continues to grow and their music and style only improve. On Friday night, hundreds of fans turned out for N.R.B.Q.'s second appearance at the Rusty Nail this semester.

Opening for N.R.B.Q. was a band called the Chills. Like N.R.B.Q., their music was upbeat and light. While they were quite good, they were not especially appreciated by the audience. N.R.B.Q. fans are loyal. The moment the Chills left the stage, the previously empty dance floor began to fill, as "B.Q." disciples came forward to be nearer the stage. For the rest of the evening the floor and aisles were packed and they pulsated with the energy of people dancing.

And N.R.B.Q. did not disappoint anyone. Their enthusiasm and crazy sense of humor was infectious. They sang a couple of songs from their new album, as well as most of the songs they are best known for such as, the song, "All Night", which was sung alone by "Big Al" with a lot of help from the audience. "Driving in my Car," "It Was an Accident," and "Captain Lou" were also big hits with the crowd. In fact, whatever N.R.B.Q., sang or did on stage the crowd enjoyed. And N.R.B.Q., in their characteristic style, rose to match the enthusiasm of the audience.

Today when so much music sounds methodical, N.R.B.Q. is refreshingly spontaneous. There really is no other act like them. They are unique, from their style of dress (bright colors and wild patterns), to their style of playing instruments (the piano player pounces on the keyboard as if it were a bongo drum), to their devoted following; an N.R.B.Q. audience can't seem to keep their feet still or wipe the foolish, happy grins from their faces. As a band they have always been willing to improvise and deviate from the norm musically, and most often their commitment to spontaniety has been to their benefit. However, it did prevent them from an appearance on Saturday Night Live since they could not tell the producers in advance which song they would perform. With N.R.B.Q. there are always surprises!

N.R.B.Q. loves the Valley, and the Northeast is the area that they have always been best received. As they continue to tour further West, their popularity is expanding. At the Bottom Line in New York they are now playing before sell out crowds. (They'll be at the Bottom Line on or about, Dec. 15.) And like "Dead Heads," N.R.B.Q. fans are willing to travel to see them play. (Although unlike Dead Heads, I doubt very many spend a few weeks on the road travelling with them.) At the Nail on Friday, I met fans from the Cape, Springfield and Boston College. I asked one man why he travelled from the Cape to see them, he replied, "They are the most fun band around. You can't help but feel great when you see them. So much else in life is serious, but I know when I see N.R.B.Q. I can put some of that seriousness aside and go crazy!" I'm sure his response would be echoed by most in the crowd.

Brazean penetrates the mystery of Stevens

PARTS OF A WORLD: WALLACE STEVENS REMEMBERED
By Peter Brazeau
Random House, 330 pages, $19.95, (Hardback)

By DAVID TAYLOR
Collegian Correspondent

The medium of poetry is one that exists outside its authorial context - it can be read, understood and appreciated without the reader having any knowledge of the poet. But the ability to fit the poem into a wider context by means of reference to the poet and his life gives an added depth and meaning to the work and enhances the final poetic experience. When I studied the poetry of Wallace Stevens there was no such context to the poetry. Stevens was enigmatic because the poet Stevens and the insurance-man Stevens seemed irreconcilable and his private life took on an irrelevance which made the man seem unapproachable from a literary point of view.

Peter Brazeau, author of Parts of a World.

PARTS OF A WORLD is an intense biography of Wallace Stevens which attempts to penetrate the mystery of Steven's life and to supply the context which until now has been missing. The book is sub-titled "An Oral Biography" and comprises a myriad of different facets and perspectives on Steven's private life by means of documented interviews with the poet's contemporaries - family, other literary figures, and his work-mates. Among those interviewed are Conrad Aiken, Samuel French Morse and Harry Levin.

The book is divided into three sections - "The Insurance Man," "The Man of Letters," and "The Family Man." The most interesting is the second section which deals with Stevens in the context of the literary society of the early twentieth century. He became acquainted with many of America's best modern writers and artist - as William Carlos Williams said, "He was really felt to be part of the gang." Yet the vital but modest poet was also a leading light in the field of insurance. What comes across from the biography is Steven's great mental energy. He regarded the reading in public of his poetry as an opportunity only to analyze his art.

Few people, it seems, were friends of Stevens. "Stevens didn't have any friends" says one of the contributers. But there were 'intimates' - those who got closest 'o the man, and Peter Brazeau has done well in tracking these sources down, and researching deep into the Stevens archives to present a close and intimate record of the poet as man. Stevens was trapped in an unhappy marriage, a situation carefully set down in the last section of the biography. Piece by piece the reader learns the details of Steven's life, enabling him to create a three-dimensional portrait of the poet, adding immeasurable to our understanding of the poetry's context.

This is an important and vitally refreshing biography of one of America's greatest poets written in an intense and interesting style. Brazeau finally strips away the myth that has surrounded Wallace Steven's life, and has at last shown that the insurance salesman, the man of letters and the family man are not separate, but merely parts of a world.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

Not another Grenada article

There has been quite a lot of publicity concerning the recent invasion of Grenada by the United States. However, much of the publicity has centered on whether or not it was morally correct. But people, you're all missing the point. Everyone was in favor of the invasion. Basically, the way I see it is that every stereotyped group is in favor. You've got your Monday Night Football watcher whose most prized possession is his copy of the Charlie Daniels song "In America." This character is happy that we finally kicked some Commie butt.

Then you've got your basic left-wing, long-haired, radical Deadhead, who was dying for something new to complain about. Come on Trouble Makers of America, admit it. You were sick and tired of complaining about nuclear weapons in Europe, abortion, and saving the Praying Mantis. When you woke up on October 24th (25th, 26th, or whenever it occurred) and you turned on the radio and heard the news, you were one happy dude. Not since Vietnam has the U.S. government done something as beneficial for you. Now you can be on Nightline once again. And, if you were a younger bummed out radical who'd missed the days of the draft, now there is hope. You have an honest to goodness chance to make an appearance in a national publication. Seriously, I'd like to take the time to congratulate you. I mean, you were going to complain about something anyway, but now you have something to "bitch" about, which means something.

It also gave college studs (like me) a chance to use a new line. "So, what do you think about Grenada?" said the guy to the female. This affected both parties because it gave the cute female (or the not so cute female depending on the time of the party and the amount of alcohol consumed) a different, interesting line to hear other than "Don't I know you?," "So, what is your major?", "Where on campus do you live?" and "Do you have the time?"

Others are pleased by the invasion too. ROTC members can get excited because now, for a change, they look more important than foolish. And all anti-ROTC people are happy because maybe they'll get a chance to get these modern-day patriots out of their lives. Professors and students of courses like Mathematical Logic and Model Theory were relieved to have something interesting to talk about for a change.

The invasion took one's mind off of what the D.C. was serving (Have you ever noticed that any UMass article attempting humor must have at least one D.C. joke in it? It is like a prerequisite for humor here.). It gave the SGA a chance to debate for hours and come up with a meaningless resolution; it gave the Collegian and other literary sources something to beat to death; and it finally gave one Karl Schieneman something to write about.

So, all I can say is let's sit back and enjoy the invasion while we can. Who knows when we'll be so fortunate again.

Different pictures of reality

In the picture the little boy was sitting up on the edge of the stretcher, his body was bloodied. He was screaming crying. Behind him lay his little brother, unconscious. He would eventually die. He looked about three years old.

Medics were carrying the stretcher while people looked on, horrified by the sight of these children, of what was happening around them. Their city was being destroyed, their friends and neighbors were being killed.

"I was sick of all the liberalism and radicalism and I know there had to be people out there who shared my conservative political views. I found there are quite a few," said William Pyne recently. Pyne is founder and president of the newly formed University of Massachusetts Republican Club.

A few miles away a truck loaded with explosives had ripped apart the dreams of two hundred young men while they slept in a land unfamiliar to them, in a conflict confusing them.

"It is upsetting to see so much dislike for the government. When one goes to a radical student rally on campus in opposition of American foreign policy they don't get a feeling of pride and support for their country," said Steve Erickson, treasurer of the University of Massachusetts Republican Club.

On a small island in the Atlantic Ocean United States military Rangers rescued several medical school students. During the mission several civilians were killed and a hospital for the mentally insane was bombed. Our government said it was essential for the safety of the students and for the preservation of democracy.

"In any given social system there are bound to be flaws but I think the United States is the best country in the world to live in. We want to eliminate the flaws and work to make a better country, William Pyne was saying.

Last Sunday the Devlin family buried their son and brother Michael. He was killed in Beirut. He was a student here for one year. He was 21 years old.

"It is going to be a good year. I think it is fun to start a club and watch it grow," Steve Erickson was saying.

There is more than one candidate

Imagine how disastrous the next four years will be if Ronald Reagan is reelected in 1984?

Military spending will increase and there will be more cuts in domestic programs and education. Blacks, minorities and women can expect few gains during his next administration, and it's likely that Reagan will appoint more conservative Supreme Court Justices. In addition to this dismal forecast, the arms race will probably escalate and Reagan might continue to ignore the voices of over 85 percent of the American public who favor a nuclear freeze.

Miriam Zoll

If you've been following the Democratic presidential campaigns like I have, you're probably wondering which candidate has the best chance to defeat Reagan if he decides to run. The way things look now two of the candidates, former vice president Walter Mondale and Senator Alan Cranston (D-Cal), have realistic chances of winning the national democratic nomination this summer.

Up until now, only one of the democratic candidates, Senator Gary Hart (D-Colo), whose campaign has been faltering during the past few months, has targeted the potential student and young people voting bloc.

Since 1972, when the 26th amendment to the United States Constitution lowered the voting age from 21 to 18, young people have come nowhere near realizing their potential electoral impact. With a crucial national election coming up however, millions of young people have the opportunity to back a progressive candidate who can defeat Reagan and stop the arms race.

College conservatives and groups like the Young Republicans have been more noticeable on campus nationwide since the Republican victory in 1980. The vast majority of young people, though, are liberal and progressive, and with the nuclear freeze as his number one campaign issue, Cranston has a good chance of winning young people's support. And if a vote for Cranston means a vote for the nuclear freeze, it automatically translates into an anti-Reagan vote as well.

There is a potential student voting bloc of over 400,000 in Massachusetts, and during the state primary this March 13th, students will have a chance to show the presidential candidates, and other students throughout the United States, who the young people in one of the major Northeast industrial states support for president in 1984.

Many people think that Mondale will win the Massachusetts primary because he's backed by Governor Michael Dukakis and labor. Others argue that Senator John Glenn (D-Ohio) will win because, in the past, Massachusetts' liberal facade has broken down and conservative democrats, like former governor Edward King, have been voted into office.

But last April, Cranston beat Glenn and came in third behind Mondale and the issue of jobs at the State Democratic Issues Convention in Springfield. Even though Mondale has received important political endorsements from the AFL-CIO and the National Education Association, Cranston still has a better chance than Mondale of defeating Reagan in his homestate of California. Cranston is hidden by the press attention paid to Mondale now, but don't forget, Jimmy Carter was hardly visible during the beginning of his campaign for president in 1975.

Senator Cranston is speaking this afternoon in the Student Union Ballroom. Whether or not you support his campaign, it is important that UMass students attend his speech and the nuclear freeze rally to let him know that young people will be a decisive voting bloc in the '84 elections.

Coming home on weekends

It's hard to be in one place when your friends are in another. It is even harder when they are all in a different place; they are all different. We all went away to school and we all belong in a different environment now. It is hard to accept this change sometimes. I wonder if my friendships from home have really lasted. We don't all wear the same outfits that we did in high school. We could have been an ad for Levi's and Izod then. Now we wear red converse high tops, glow-in-the-dark earrings, and our hair is cut so that it goes back on the sides, and up in the middle. We're from New York, Philadelphia, and Chicago.

Michelle Dolan

When I came home from a trip to visit one of my friends at another University this past weekend, I realized this. As we walked the streets of Philadelphia after dark, unable to find the Liberty Bell, my friend said, "This is ridiculous. I live here." 'Yeah,' I thought. 'And I live in Massachusetts.' It was a strange realization. It was exciting and saddening at the same time. I had to tell myself how good it was to have been able to go to a different place and to fit in, to convince myself that it was good. But inside, I wondered where the friendship had gone, and if it was better or worse after this change.

My friendships don't seem to be gone. After all, there is always the chance to visit a friend, and that's fun. Long weekends are a perfect time to visit, we want to get away anyway. It gives us the chance to see something new, and forget about the pressure of school. On those trips away, it seems that we come and go; with just enough time in between to party and talk. When we leave it can be sad. It can be sad because it wasn't more than a few drinks or a movie, because it wasn't more than a short tour of a foreign campus, a bemused reaction to a new place. And then we are separate again. Our daily routines, our struggles, our jokes, and our parties, are bridges by many miles.

It seems that friends should struggle together, laugh together, and party together. And because of that these weekend trips are only weekend trips, and the friendships only last for that long. When I saw the way my friend in Philadelphia had changed, from the way I knew him before, and realized that I have too, I knew that this is partly true. It made me a little sad. But it is also a lesson in knowing that you can't go on thinking that the past will last forever. As long as you accept change, you're alright. I also learned that accepting change is what makes the friendship last. So I told my friend that I thought Philadelphia was a fun place to live. And he invited me back; to visit.

Exercising our voting clout

To the Editor,

In the wake of "The Day After", many of us are asking ourselves what we can do to alter the present administration's insane policy of nuclear arms escalation. Well, there is something we can do.

Today there will be a nuclear freeze rally at 2:00 in the Student Union Ballroom. Democratic presidential candidate Alan Cranston will deliver the keynote address.

An excellent way for us to become involved and show how much the students of this university care about the current state of world and national affairs, especially regarding the crucial issue of nuclear arms, is to attend today's rally. We must as college students, as well as concerned citizens, begin to exercise our enormous potential political clout.

Today's rally and voter registration drive is a great way for us here at UMass to begin.

Clarifying the "walk-out"

To the Editor,

Allow me the space to respond to a letter published in your November 9th, edition written by Lisa Stratoutly of Patterson dorm, Southwest.

Ms. Stratoutly said "I found myself laughing uncontrollable in the Campus Center Reading room by the fifth paragraph of the article, [GRENADA MOTION CAUSES SGA WALKOUT] not at the reporter's humor, but at the incredible ridiculous situation the poor woman was unfortunate enough to report on."

That the writer, Ms. Stratoutly, was able to find humor in the political statement that the SGA co-Presidents, myself and 30 other student senators made by walking out of the Senate meeting after the motion to condemn the U.S. invasion of Grenada failed, is interesting. Perhaps the invasion itself, was to her a laughable matter. Who is to say?

Our position was clear! We felt that the lives and sovereignty of the Grenadian people was in no way comparable to the notion of freedom of the press; that we were dealing with human beings and not some abstract notion. It is advisible to state here--that we also were outraged at President Reagan's handling of the press but saw it not as important as the flagrant disregard for international laws of conduct aimed at governing the actions of nation states. What was clear was the fact that we saw the invasion, as students who will be subject to the draft come the war, as being uniquely a student issue and no less important than tuition hikes, poor lighting on campus, sexual harassment on campus and the vast array of issues dealt with on the senate floor. We've taken vigorous stance on those issues and our stance on the Grenada invasion is to be no less vigorous.

She went further, "George McKenzie, a Third World Caucus senator and supporter (author)* of the resolution, went so far as to resign his position after the defeat of the resolution;..." Again, for your information I did not resign my position, I merely mentioned my intention to do so. To the credit of many members of this senate and most of all fellow members of the Third World Caucus, and some 250 student supporters, I was convinced that a resignation would merely render the senate into the hands of those who dare not take principled stances on issues as controversial as the Grenada resolution.

She carried her statement futher and added, "To resign his position due to conflicting opinions is a cowardly, narrow-minded action." It would appear to be the contrary! Indeed those who led the fight to defeat the motion on the grounds that it was not a student issue, that the senate was being turned into the U.N., that the notion of freedom of the press is more important than human lives, and that an act such as the invasion of Grenada is and can be rationalized away, is what I sought to protest when I announce my intention to resign.

Even as I write this response, the issue of Grenada has still not settled in my mind, nor in the minds of millions of other people around the world. It will take, I'm afraid, a very long time for it to do so. The sense of rape and rage I (and so many others) felt when at 5:45 a.m., on that now historic day of Oct. 25th, the telephone rang and the caller announced, "Grenada is being invaded--the U.S. is invading Grenada!" is very much present.

Whatever that may be said of the actions taken either on my part or on the part of the SGA co-Presidents and supporting senators, let it at least be said that those actions were guided by passion and love for life and people. Love for some of the very principles upon which this nation was built: People have a right to pursue "Life, Liberty and Happiness". The Grenadian people have such a right. Their quest for such will not faint, even in the presence of the most powerful war machine. Their revolution will prevail!

George M. McKenzie

You can do something too

To the Editor,

I, too, am outraged by the presence of advertisements for the U.S. armed forces in the Spring Course Schedule Book. (See the November 15th Letter to the Editor by Peter Thompson.)

We can send a message back to the publishers - write directly on the BUSINESS REPLY MAIL cards facing page 65. They'll pay the postage to hear that we object to the insane glorification of the military and resent their attempted coercion. That mail permit is valid through September 30, 1984.

Concerned about darkness

To the Editor,

We, the students of University of Massachusetts and those affiliated with the students, are concerned with the lack of lighting on the Sylvan access road. This concern is due to the fact of the recent assaults on campus and other problems presented by the lack of lighting on the road. This lack of lighting not only affects the riders and workers from the Tilson Farm Equine Center, but also affects joggers, pedestrians, and bicycle riders. This problem also affects motor vehicle operators, because they cannot see the pedestrians due to the lack of lighting. There is no bus before 7:30 a.m. and after 6:00 p.m., the buses run forty-five minutes apart. It seems that it would be easier to install lighting than to readjust the entire bus route to fit the needs of the people. We need lighting on the road for our safety and the safety of others. We hope you will take the stated problem into serious consideration and take prompt action in remedying this situation.

Let us beat their heads in

A rising tide of conservatism at UMass? Why am I not surprised?

I always knew there were enough ignoramuses on campus to flock to the worst possible political activism.

It's a good time to be a patriot, and not just because the New England football team had been doing surprisingly well. The big bad United States of America has gone in and beat up on tiny Grenada. Liberalism has been shoved back into the shadows because we've finally killed some commies. Isn't that the way God meant it to be?

Rich Nangle

Otherwise apathetic students now have something to be proud of. Maybe we can't beat the Colts but there are other have-nots we can conquer.

But wait a minute. This is Massachusetts, not Arkansas. People here are supposed to be driven by some sort of enlightenment. Isn't this the state that laughed the loudest when Tricky Dick left the Oval Office in disgrace? We alone voted for that mush liberal McGovern, remember? He's that wimp who supported peace and people over bombs and corporations.

Now we have a new bunch of preppy frat boys signing up in droves to join backward conservative organizations on a campus that has traditionally stood for the liberal (politically correct) point of view.

And maybe I'm being shortsighted to think that this is just because conservatism has enjoyed its finest autumn in many years. What with the shooting down of KAL 007 by the evil empire, the replacing of Watt by a quiet but equally depraved ideologue named Clark, the inevitable deployment of death weapons in Europe and dead martyrs to mourn in Lebanon and the Grenada invasion conservatives can only be wondering what is next? Public education? Minorities? The possibilities are endless.

Maybe I'm being easy on these new born-again converts. Maybe I'm giving them too much credit for having the ability to think.

Perhaps this new sense of macho inferiority nationalism has been brought on by our tragic defeat to the Australians in the America's Cup (just the thought of it brings tears to my eyes).

Or maybe it's the way those damned campus communists dress with their silly overalls and dirty sweatshirts while they eat vile earthfoods in that socialist empire known as the Student Unio*

So let's cut our hair real short and harass anyone who doesn't. Let's carry the flag and support truth, justice and the American way. And let's beat the shit out of anyone who doesn't see it our way.

Let's chastise the liberal slanted press when we read facts in the newspaper that don't jibe with our narrow beliefs. Of course that's if we choose to read. We usually choose to drink beer.

Let's vote for Flynn in Boston because he's white and let's kill that black presidential candidate Jesse Jackson because he wants to turn this country into another Africa.

Let's support U.S. military intervention in El Salvador, Chile, Nicaraugua and any other country we can't locate on a map.

And most of all let's do something that takes some real effort. Let's go to a top notch school to get an education and remain stupid.

Miami gets Shula

MIAMI (AP) — Miami Dolphins Coach Don Shula, saying he's happy and at home in Miami, signed on Monday for at least a few more years with the National Football League club he has directed to four Super Bowl appearances since 1970.

Neither Shula, 53, nor Dolphins owner Joe Robbie would disclose any terms of the new deal, saying they were "personal to both of us."

Last month Shula turned down an offer of at least $1 million a year to coach the rival United States Football League's New Jersey Generals.

Minuteman basketball opens vs. UNH

Veteran team looks for win

By GERRY deSIMAS
Collegian Staff

After six weeks of pounding the floor of the ancient Curry Hicks Cage and playing against imaginary opponents, the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team is ready.

They are ready to register a winning season after a 9-20 mark last year. They are ready to rock the Cage. They are ready to take on a New Hampshire team that UMass has lost to six times in the last seven years, tonight at 7:30 p.m. in UMass' season opener.

But most of all according to rookie head coach Ron Gerlufsen, the team is ready and willing to play basketball.

"We're real excited," the head coach said yesterday after practice. "We've been practicing a long time and we've worked hard. We are looking forward to the competition."

The competion comes in the form of the New Hampshire Wildcats, who have beaten UMass for the last four years. Last year, the Minutemen led 60-50 with a little under four minutes to go when the Wildcats clamped down a vicious full-court press and outscored UMass 13-0 to win 63-60.

"They seem to always get up for us," Gerlufsen said. "It will be a tough ballgame." The Wildcats will attack with their top two scorers from last year, Dan Nolan (16.1 a game) and Al McClain (12.8). UNH went 16-12 last year for coach Gerry Friel.

"We will try to focus the defense on the two of them," Gerlufsen said, Gerlufsen will be looking for the Minutemen to accomplish three things besides the obvious fact of winning the ballgame.

"Three things that we've worked on is ballhandling, individual team defense and I'd like to see game intensity for a full 40 minutes. We've been working hard in these areas.

"Hopefully we can force UNH to shoot a low percentage from the floor. I want our team to come out and play our hardest for 40 minutes. If we can accomplish these things we'll win."

WHATS GOT EVERYBODYS ATTENTION? — The rebound off a shot in Massachusetts win over Zadar of Yugoslavia two weeks ago. Horace Neysmith (15), co-captain Edwin Green, and opponent go for the elusive rebound.

Alas, the best laid plans of mice and basketball teams often go astray and thus the players will have to be on their toes. Four of the five probable starters are back from last year.

Rookie Carl Smith will lead the team from the point guard slot allowing junior co-captain Donald Russell to move over to the shooting guard position. At the point last year, Russell averaged 13.3 points a game.

Sophomore John Hempel will have to do without his long range bombs from three point land this year at one forward position.

Hempel, an Atlantic 10 All-Rookie team pick last year led the team in scoring last year with 16.2 a game.

At the other forward postion, Horace Neysmith will hopefully be gathering in the rebounds (he was the team leader last year).

At the center will be the big man (i.e. team leader) senior co-captain Edwin Green from Tampa, Fiorida.

First off the bench should be guards Craig Smith, Ron Young, and forward Bobby Braun, according to Gerlufsen.

Massachusetts will be looking for the win, which will be very important if UMass is to be over .500 this year as Gerlufsen wants to be. If the Minutemen can top UNH tonight and then dispose of Bentley on Saturday, it will give them an inspiring 2-0 start which will put UMass in a much better frame of mind going to their tough Southern swing the next weekend.

And if they are 2-0, the fans will be even more excited.

"The crowds in the Cage are always a factor," Gerlufsen said. "The fans here at UMass are very Knowledgable and enthusastic. They're worth a few points in every game."

The Cage floor will be rocking tonight at 7:30, tip-off, and the stands should be too.

UM wrestlers host 29th ranked Hofstra tonight

By JOHN BADGER
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts wrestling team lost its opener last Tuesday at conference favorite Boston University.

"Anytime you open against a conference champion you're going to have problems," said Coach Rick Freitas, "I felt we were in better shape than they were but our lack of experience hurt us."

Nine of the Minutemen's ten starters never wrestled at the college level before. Only senior captain Scott McQuaide had experience wrestling in a college dual match.

BU's Dennis King decisioned Rich Gardiner at the 118 spot. Gardiner wrestled even with King (the larger and stronger of the two) until King scored at the end of the second period and held the lead for the rest of the match.

At 126 freshman Chris Lee pinned BU's Mark Oliphant in 31 seconds to put the Minutemen on the board. "That was the quickest dual match I've seen since I've been here," said Freitas.

The Terriers went on to get pins at the 134, 150, and 177 weight classes.

McQuaide came on strong for UMass at 167 pounds and decisioned BU's Pete Iaenello 144. The senior is just four weeks off a hernia operation and may be tested against Hofstra's Pete Capone tonight. Capone is ranked third in the nation at the 167 spot. Whether or not he will wrestle at that weight tonight remains to be seen.

Wesley Beckwith and Bill Pearsull lost close decisions at the 142 and 158 marks respectively.

> "Anytime you open against a conference champion you're going to have problems," said Freitas. "Our lack of experience hurt us."

"I was pleased with the performance of my middle weights," said Freitas. "They wrestled well and executed some new moves that we've only recently worked on."

UMass and BU traded forfeits at the final two positions. 160 lb. Francisco Guttierez is the closest thing the Minutemen have to a 190 pounder and BU didn't want anything to do with UMass' 260 lb. heavyweight Mike Dwyer.

The Minutemen face Hofstra at 7:00 p.m. tonight at Boyden. The Flying Dutchmen are ranked 29th in the country and should make for an exciting match. Support UMass wrestling by buying a program and poster tonight and get a free Olympic Sweepstakes entree.

Minutewomen psyched for meeting powerful St. Johns

By ADAM NAZIMOWITZ
Collegian Staff

After concluding a disappointing weekend as the hosts of a tournament, the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team will have its hands full trying to rebound against the tough St. John's team, who have one of the strongest teams in the Big East.

"They made it to the NCAA tournament last year and are perenially strong. We realize it's going to be difficult, but we're going in with a good attitude. The kids are out to play to win, and not just absorb another loss," said Coach Barbara Stevens.

The Minutewomen (0-2) lost both games of the tournament this weekend, but did show some bright spots in defeat. They were led by Barbara Hebel's strong 29 point performance and as a team they grabbed as many rebounds as UConn, 43. They were led in that department by center Kelly Collins who pulled down nine boards, but will not play against St. Johns because of an achilles injury, and hopefully will return to action this weekend. Karen Damminger, who played well with an 11 point, eight rebound performance vs. UConn, will start in her place.

UMass also outrebounded URI by a 38-29 margin but dished out less assists against both teams and shot poorly in both games.

"We lost to UConn, but played a pretty good game. We had things together for 40 minutes, but gave up too many fouls in overtime. We were a step behind and the transition wasn't working. They hit shots and we didn't. We will have to be more aggressive against St. Johns because they always have a strong team," said senior captain Wendy Ward.

St. Johns is led by center Diane Pugh

Now five suspects in Crampton fires

By MARY BETH HEBERT, JILL LANG and PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

A state trooper last night told residents of arson plagued Crampton dormitory at the University of Massachusetts, which experienced its 15th fire set on a student's desk, yesterday that the investigation has been narrowed to five suspects.

Speaking in a lounge packed with dorm residents, Jay Bowman, assigned to the case by the district attorney, said it is likely the fires, occurring in trash rooms, bathrooms, on bulletin boards and most recently in a student's room, have been set by one person. While officials are not discounting the possibility of group involvement and may be seeking a "ring leader", all notes found concerning the fires have been in the same handwriting, he said.

Bowman said the field of suspects included everyone in the dorm Monday but was narrowed to five because of increased resident cooperation in the past 24 hours.

Beginning today, Crampton will be staffed with security personnel--trained housing security, Crampton residents and uniformed guards--on all wings of the four story building, 24 hours a day. All locks, except for the main entrance, will be changed, though it was not decided at last night's meeting whether all guests would be required to sign in.

According to Rosemary Tarantino of the Hampshire County District Attorney's Office, the dorm's 15th fire was found yesterday shortly after 10 a.m. by a student returning from a shower. The student, who lived on the second floor, had left the door unlocked and returned to find papers on her desk ablaze. The room sustained no damage and the fire was put out by students wielding extinguishers, though residents were evacuated into a cold drizzle.

Officials questioned would not say if notes were found prior to yesterday's fire, as occurred Monday.

While University sources set the total of Crampton fires this semester at 15, some dorm residents claim 17 have now been set.

Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Dennis Madson, who will be addressing the Faculty Senate Thursday to request faculty cooperation in dealing with Crampton residents having academic difficulties, said in afternoon press conference that 22 Crampton residents now want to move out of the dorm.

"We can handle them all," Madson said, noting swing spaces will be used to accomodate the students, with the Campus Center Hotel as a backup. "We'll give them options about moving. We can't give them refunds."

Madson also acknowledged the investigation's progress.

"There are a number of important suspects in the case," he said. "Some are students, some are not. I just wish I could tell you we are close to solving it. We are following up on every lead that comes in.

"There have been many, many calls from concerned parents," Madson said. "We cannot alleviate fears by telling them about our investigation and security measures."

"We are helpless in terms of knowing how to respond to parents," agreed Director of Housing Services Joseph Zannini at the press conference. Zannini also addressed last night's Crampton meeting, where students proposed that he and the fire marshall "live in Crampton for a week so they can experience the fear and paranoia we feel."

MassPIRG advocates sulphur emissions limit

By LARRY BOUCHIE
Collegian Correspondent

In a petition drive to collect signatures supporting a statewide cap on sulfur emissions, the UMass division of the Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group (MassPIRG) collected more than 500 signatures in the Campus Center Concourse Tuesday.

MassPIRG is trying to persuade Massachusetts Governor Michael Dukakis to impose such an emissions cap.

"Having met once with Lieutenant Governor John Kerry, MassPIRG decided that a petition drive in support of an emissions cap might offer a greater incentive to impose a cap," said Rich McClintock, campus coordinator of UMassPIRG.

"MassPIRG hopes to get 10,000 signatures statewide in one week, including 1,000 signatures from the Amherst area," McClintock said.

"MassPIRG has also been helping individual towns pass their own sulphur emissions cap resolutions to demonstrate public support for the proposal, "McClintocksaid. Amherst Town Meeting recently passed one such resolution.

According to data compiled by both the National Academy of Sciences and the Acid Rain Monitoring Project, 20 to 30 percent of acid rain in Massachusetts in caused by sulphur emissions within the state.

The National Academy of Sciences has also concluded that the evidence pointing to sulphur emissions as the major cause of acid rain is "overwhelming," and has called for 50 percent reductions in sulphur emissions over the next ten years.

Presidential candidate Alan Cranston said he would support such a nationwide resolution during a rally Tuesday in the Student Union Ballroom on the UMass campus.

"Once MassPIRG gets 10,000 signatures and a list of towns that have passed emissions cap resolution, we will return to the Governor's office with a better demonstration of public support," McClintock said.

UMassPIRG representatives will be at a table in the Campus Center Concourse from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. through Friday to collect signatures and provide information about acid rain.

Provost search committee begins reviewing candidates

By STEPPHEN HOWE
Collegian Staff

The search committee formed to find a permanent provost and vice chancellor for Academic Affairs at the University of Massachusetts is meeting today to begin considering candidates for that position.

The search to target a final candidate for recommendation to Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey is expected to take several more months at the very least, according to Richard Stein, search committee chair.

"We're really just beginning. We're several months off," Stein said.

Samuel F. Conti now fills the position in an acting capacity and will continue to do so until a permanent replacement is hired. Conti replaced former acting Provost Dean Alfange, who resigned from the post in September.

The position of provost was formally vacated by Loren Baritz last June but Alfange had been acting provost since late 1982.

The provost is chief academic advisor on campus and an internal administrative leader. Supervision of faculty and academic programs is the primary responsibility of the provost.

The University began a nationwide search for a provost last year at the time of Baritz's resignation. The candidate Duffey selected for the position, however, had already accepted a position at the University of Tennessee. Duffey initiated a second search early last month.

According to Stein, candidates from UMass and outside of the University will be considered and a decision will probably not be reached until spring.

"There will undoubtably be over a hundred of these applications," Stein said. "You can't hurry these procedures."

One administrator contacted yesterday cited a lack of administrative stability at the University as a result of the absence of a permanent provost.

Frederick W. Byron Jr., dean of the School of Mathematics and natural sciences, said the University "suffers when you don't have long term stability."

"In the day to day running of the provost's office, Dr. Conti has been doing a good job," Byron said. "But the main problem when you don't have a permanent provost is that projects which evolve over a long period of time suffer."

CANDIDATE ON CAMPUS—Candidate for the Democratic Presidential nomination Sen. Alan Cranston, D-Calif., enters the Student Union Ballroom Tuesday before his speech to about 500 people. See related story on Spotlight on page 5.

Rape defendants claim cops lied

FALL RIVER (AP) — Two men accused of raping a young woman on a barroom pool table testified Tuesday that police told lies and insulted them during questioning and failed to inform them of their rights.

"They were saying what I had done, that I was a pig, and I was no good," Daniel Silvia of New Bedford testified in Portuguese through an interpreter.

Silvia and Joseph Vieira, both 27, took the stand at a hearing on defense motions to suppress evidence the two may have given police on March 7. They were arrested the previous day after a 21-year-old woman said she was gang raped at Big Dan's Tavern in New Bedford.

The case drew national attention when police reported the woman was raped for more than two hours while bar patrons cheered her attackers on.

In addition to Silvia and Vieira, rape indictments were returned against John M. Cordeiro and Victor M. Raposo, both of New Bedford.

Accused on accessory charges were Virgilio Medeiros and Jose Medeiros, both of New Bedford. The two are not related.

Trial is scheduled Feb. 6.

Silvia said police never told him he had the right to remain silent and to consult an attorney.

"No one told me anything," he said. "They just asked me questions."

Silvia also said police demanded to see whether he was wearing underwear and asked him to pull down his pants to show he was not.

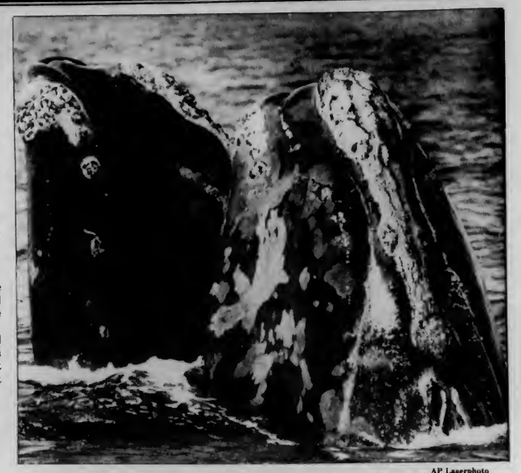
When defense attorney Edward Harrington asked why he cooperated, Silvia said, "Because the police do what they want with us ... because if I didn't, they might beat me."

Patients may refuse drug treatment

BOSTON (AP) — Patients in mental hospitals have a right to refuse continued treatment with antipsychotic drugs unless they are ruled incompetent by a judge, the state Supreme Court declared Tuesday.

The high court was asked to answer nine questions on state law by the 1st U.S. Court of Appeals. The federal court is considering a suit by patients at the Boston State Hospital against the commissioner of mental health, several physicians and administrators.

The drugs, which the court said can have dangerous side effects, are used in the treatment of schizophrenia and related conditions to curb possible violence. The medications include Thorazine, Mellaril, Prolixin and Haldol, the court said.



A synopsis released with the ruling explained, "A patient may be treated with antipsychotic drugs against his will and without prior court approval to prevent the immediate, substantial and irreversible deterioration of a serious mental illness." But, it said, this cannot be continued unless the patient is found incompetent to determine his course of treatment.

Fermata helps save the whales

BOSTON (AP) — Fermata, who spends her summers frolicking off the coast of Maine, had another baby this summer and the birth has scientists excited about the future of her breed, most endangered of all the large whales.

The lumbering mother is a right whale, so called "because they're the right whales to kill," says Scott Kraus, a research associate who has spent the last three years monitoring them in the North Atlantic.

"You can catch up to them in a rowboat," he said. "They're slow, they float when dead and they yielded the most amount of oil and baleen, which was most important for the corset industry."

Scientists know very little about the whales, so when they spotted the 45-ton black mammal with her baby off the Massachusetts coast this summer, it meant a leap in knowledge. They knew it was the same whale because of the lump of thickened skin on her head, shaped like the musical symbol fermata, which means to hold the note.

Kraus, who heads the New England Aquarium research group monitoring the whales, came to Boston to deliver a paper Tuesday night on Fermata and her colleagues, at the Fifth Biennial Conference on the Biology of Marine Mammals.

"It's significant and encouraging that one of the known females has given birth to two calves," Kraus said in an interview Tuesday. "It suggests at least a hint of a birthing interval. It could be a four-year interval, or it could be shorter."

With the population of right whales in the North Atlantic down to about 200, any birth is important, he said. Scientists estimate only four or five right whales are born in the North Atlantic each year.

Boston union president speaks on labor situation

By BROOKE STATES
Collegian Staff

"You don't have to apologize to anybody because you have to make beds," was the message that Domenic Bozzotto sent to the 60 person gathering in the Campus Center Tuesday night.

Bozzotto is the resident of Union Local 26, Hotel Restaurant; Institutional Employees, and Bartenders Union, Boston. He spoke to the gathering about how his local won their three-year contract, and what the general situation for organized labor is in the country.

I am 43 and I have worked in hotels since I was 13. In Boston the Hotel industry used to be a mom-and-pop industry. The owners lived in the hotels, now it is the Marriot Chain, AETNA, and ITT," he said. "The Sheraton and Marriott in Boston are the biggest money makers in the country for their respective chains. Hotels are the second highest growth industry behind high-tech. Between now and 1986 there will be fourteen new hotels," he said.

Bozzotto said that as the hotel industry grew it changed. "The hotels became divided into the front of the house and the back of the house. Fifty percent of the workers at the Boston Sheraton are people of color, but you could walk through and never know it," he said.

"We beat the 12 year incumbent union leadership three to one. The old leadership never identified with the changing membership. South Boston used to be the largest zip code on our union's mailing list, now it is the smallest," Bozzotto said.

Bozzotto's local includes six thousand workers in six hotels in Boston, and in such diverse places as Suffolk Downs and Harvard University. In 1982 the union and the six hotels, including the Ritz, squared off over a three year contract."

"We went about trying to organize people to feel good about themselves. We borrowed from Jesse Jackson, that you are somebody. Some of the rooms in the Ritz Carlton go for $800 a night. Some of the manuals for the maids who clean those rooms are 35 pages. That is a skilled job," he said.

Bozzotto said that his strategy included home visits and talks with union member's families to make them understand that the struggle around the contract and the strike that developed out of it was a family affair.

"We drew a map of Boston and found out where our membership was. This is where the Greeks live. This is where the Haitians live. This is where this group lives. We went to community groups in the neighborhoods and said that you have to get involved in this fight. We are asking for justice from these hotels," he said.

Bozzotto said that the hotels wanted only five people on the union negotiating team and no publicity.

"We showed up with 50 and I don't think there was a media outlet that we missed. Besides the 50 member negotiating committee we had a 350 member group that could mobilize the rank and file and help counteract rumors that the Hotel owners tried to spread," he said.

"They brought scabs in from Texas and put them in the hotels, but we went in and talked to them and convinced them not to work. We set up a large picket line and only five scabs applied at their Job Opportunity Center. Three of them were our people who wanted to know what was going on," he said.

Bozzotto said that now his union has real seniority, stewards that speak whatever language members are most fluent in contract language to help end segregation between the front and backs of the hotels, and a revised pension system.

"The National AFL-CIO is a paper tiger. Lane Kirkland should have been figuring out how to call a one day strike instead of just a boycott against Greyhound. They made 19 million dollars last year and have 60 percent of the bus business in the country. They can survive the loss of business but not the loss of confidence. The only way to win the strike is to keep people from buying tickets and stop the buses. A victory for the labor movement will come when Greyound will deal with the union," he said.

Hanukkah celebration time to think of renewal

By JIM FINKLE
Collegian Staff

While reflecting upon the Jewish holiday of Hannukah, which begins tonight, people may become inspired to take a step toward reducing the dangers of a nuclear world, Hillel Rabbi Saul Perlmutter said Tuesday.

Hannukah, which is the Hebrew word for rededication, is the celebration of Jewish leader Judah Macabbee's successful revolt against the Hellenistic Syrians who occupied the land of Canaan around the year 165 B.C. During the rededication of the Jewish temple in Jerusalem, the Macabbee's priests could find only one flask of sacramental oil to burn in the temple. Although this amount of oil would burn for only one day, legend says the flame lasted for eight days.

Perlmutter said that while the fact the light lasted eight days was astounding, the true miracle was that Judah Macabbee and his followers tried to "light one little candle in the first place."

"They were taking a risk and lighting something when everything was dark and gloomy," Perlmutter said.

"One could say there are thousands of nuclear warheads," he said. "One could say what could we possibly do. Even if it is not clear what the results may be, it's important to light that first candle."

Perlmutter also said he is encouraging people to renew aid to Soviet dissidents during the eight days of Hanukkah.

"Hannukah is part of a struggle of freedom of people who are being oppressed, people who are not allowed to practice their religion," Perlmutter said.

During the past year the Soviet Union has drastically cut down on the number of Jews who are allowed to leave that country, he said. "It's easy to forget about it."

"The general message of Hannukah is a message of reassertion, of religious freedom under the face of oppression," Perlmutter said. "It's a reassertion of hope."

The University of Massachusetts chapter of B'nai B'rith Hillel has "adopted" a Soviet dissident and is encouraging the University community to write letters to Soviet and U.S. officials over the next few weeks to aid Jews in the Soviet Union.

Over the eight days of Hannukah Hillel will sponsor several parties. On Saturday evening, Hillel will begin its annual Hannukah party by preparing latkes (potato pancakes), at 5 p.m. in the Earthfoods kitchen. At 8 p.m. the party will begin in Campus Center Room 101.

During that party they will celebrate by lighting candles on a menorah. The menorah is a special candle holder with spaces for eight candles and a shamus. The Shamus, which means "head" in Hebrew, is used to light the eight other candles of each day of Hannukah. On the first evening of the holiday, only the first candle and the shamus are lit. One additional candle is lit on each successive night until the shamus and all eight candles are lit on the final night.

Perlmutter said he encourages students to participate in one of the Hillel celebrations or to organize a party in their home or dormitory. The Hillel office will distribute Hannukah candles, menorahs and songbooks this week, he said. He said they also have signs for students to put in dormitories to advertise their own celebrations. "They just have to fill in the time and place," he said.

Bike club hopes to race

By JOHN SHEEHAN
Collegian Correspondent

The UMass bicycle Club has begun a process that it hopes will eventually bring intercollegiate bicycle racing back to UMass.

Mike Carpenter, the Bike Club president, said his group plans to file a 20-page application with the Office of Athletics and Intramurals before the close of the semester, which is the first step in officially organizing a UMass intercollegiate cycling team.

The proposed team would compete in criterium races, several laps around a 2 or 3 mile loop, and bicycle road races. It would consist of both men and women, having them train together, but not competing directly against each other.

Carpenter said he hopes the UMass team will compete against teams from Yale, Harvard, and Holy Cross.

"UMass had a team in the late 60s but it broke up," Carpenter said.

Carpenter said the UMass Bicycle Club also wants to heighten bike use and awareness on campus and correct the many problems that face cyclists, noting many buildings, such as NOPE gym, lack bicycle racks.

"The administration tries to discourage automobiles on campus by charging exhorbitant parking fees, yet they are not responsive to cyclists," Carpenter said.

Carpenter said the UMass cycling team should actually be racing next semester but won't be receiving any assistance such as uniforms and transportation from the University. "That should take about a year because of the application process and all the red tape," he said.

The UMass Bike Club has been as RSO group for over ten years and sponsors bicycle touring trips throughout the semester as well as an annual trip to Florida or Virginia during Intersession. The club also plans to sponsor a bicycle road race open to everyone sometime before the end of the academic year, Carpenter said.

Educated women stymied

By DIANE LANE
Collegian Staff

More than half the women in Franklin and Hampshire Counties have at least a four year college degree compared with seventeen percent nationwide, yet jobs available are equally low status and low paying, according to Joan Sweeney, co-director of the Women's Equity Program at the University of Massachusetts.

The second of a series on working women, Women's Work and the Creation of Jobs in Franklin and Hampshire Counties, sponsored by the The Working Women's Task Force of the Everywomen's Center, addressed the increasing importance of job creation and its impact on women's lives.

A survey mailed to 2000 women representing every community in Franklin and Hampshire Counties elicited a 62 percent response rate and "an outpouring of feeling," according to Sweeney.

"No one had ever asked these questions before. The situation we have in the Valley is that of a body of women with an enormous set of resources not being tapped," said Sweeney.

Unemployed women unable to work at low-paying jobs due to child care costs chose challenging positions with a chance to upgrade their job skills as the number one criterion for returning to work.

"We were surprised to find that child care was low on the list and that both employed and unemployed women shared the same concerns," said Sweeney.

According to Sweeney, the Western Massachusetts Economic Development Conference, which is responsible for creating jobs and bringing corporations to the area does little to dispel the feeling that the Valley offers highly educated people willing to work for wages 10 percent below the national level.

"The people making decisions and creating jobs are people who are unaffected by the outcome of those decisions. WMEDC is composed of 95 percent white men," Sweeney said.

Cranston looking for nomination, jobs, peace

By BILL WALL
Collegian Staff

Calling for an all-out debate on the nuclear freeze issue and pledging to personally negotiate arms control if elected president, Sen. Alan Cranston, D-Calif., addressed about 500 people at a nuclear freeze rally in the Student Union Ballroom of the University of Massachusetts Tuesday.

"We need the hardest, longest debate in American history in this country on nuclear war. We risk surrendering ourselves to darkness but this need not be our fate. Human beings created these weapons and we can control them," said Cranston, who is trailing former Vice President Walter Mondale for the Democratic nomination in recent public opinion polls.

Lashes out at President's policies

Cranston lashed out at President Ronald Reagan and his policies, accusing Reagan of involving the U.S. directly and indirectly in four shooting wars: Lebanon, Grenada, El Salvador and Nicaragua, and lacking true commitment to arms control.

"For the next 14 months the United States will be led by a man who thinks the only way to solve every complicated international (political) problem is to send in the Marines...The President has not even the slightest hint of distress that Soviet-U.S. relations are at their lowest point since the Cuban missile crisis," said Cranston during the afternoon gathering sponsored by the UMass Peacemakers and the American Friends Service Committee.

Cranston spoke of his career - long dedication to arms control and stressed the need for high-level negotiation to resolve the arms race, as opposed to leaving it to "underlings" who get "bogged" down in details. He also criticized Reagan's arms control negotiators and the constant changing of arms control proposals.

"The first year of the Reagan administration was marked by bellicose rhetoric about limited nuclear war and (necessity for) test shooting," Cranston said. The President "feels a nuclear freeze is somehow subversive."

Administration ignores historical realities

The inability of the administration to see world situations as anything other than an East-West confrontation is to ignore historical reality in particular regions such as Lebanon and subsequently to increase the danger of nuclear war, he said.

"Causes of problems (El Salvador, Lebanon) reside in poverty and tyranny. Too often we have been indifferent to poverty and backed the tyranny. If every conflict that starts anywhere is viewed as an American-Soviet conflict, it just may lead to an American-Soviet conflict. We must join together to stop the president," Cranston said.

Cranston praised the successful negotiations conducted by former President Jimmy Carter at Camp David as an example he would seek to emulate in achieving a bilateral freeze on the production, testing and deployment of nuclear weapons. He called for an immediate moratorium on testing weapons and a subsequent percentage scaling down of the sizes of U.S. and Soviet nuclear forces.

"What is needed is an all-out effort to negotiate with the Soviet Union to end this folly before it ends us," Cranston said.

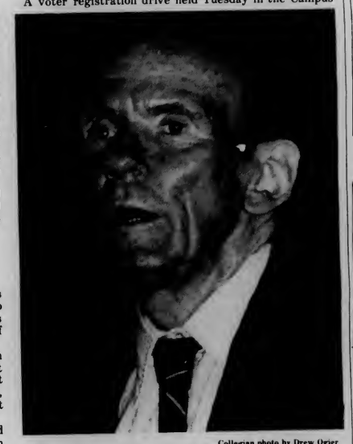
Urges student campaign involvement

Cranston urged students to get involved in his campaign, and according to Jackson Katz of the Cranston campaign at UMass, they are seeking to link the nuclear freeze with Cranston to make them synonymous in the voting public's mind, especially students, because Cranston sees the freeze as the pre-eminent issue of the day.

Also participating in the nuclear freeze rally were Jim Crosby, Cranston's on-campus campaign coordinator, Frances Crowe, director of the AFSC, and Charles Francis Carroll of the UMass Peacemakers.

"Whenever you talk about a race, you talk about a finish line. That race (the arms race) will come to an end and there will be no winners," Carroll said.

Amherst voter registration continues



A voter registration drive held Tuesday in the Campus Center in conjunction with the nuclear freeze rally and Sen. Cranston's appearance netted more than 400 new UMass voters for the Amherst area.

Six Amherst voter registrars sat at the table in the concourse from 11 a.m. to 4 p.m. and received about 200 change of address requests, besides the 400 new registrants, said Fran Pheeny, an Undergraduate Student Senate Public Policy Committee member who organized the drive.

"I would call it a success," Pheeny said. Action at the table "got hectic between class changes, but it was a steady flow all day," she said.

Pheeny said she would have liked to address the rally on "the importance of voter registration and voting in the nuclear freeze movement," but scheduling problems at the rally prevented her from speaking.

Collegian staff writers Tami Borton and John O'Connell contributed to this report.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The only way is not to play

In 1960 the United States and the Soviet Union had less than 100 long-range land-based missles between them. Twenty three years later each side has thousands of missiles and warheads, all more powerful and effective (i.e. deadly), then those of 1960. Yet we are far less secure despite all of this nuclear arsenal. Billions have been spent on weapons. That money might have better gone towards dealing with some of the social problems that will help create the war, before the war that will be fought with bows and arrows.

Brooke States

Some argue that nuclear weapons will never be used, and are in fact only a deterrent. The problem with this is that there has never been a weapon which has not been used. You have weapons to use them if you need them. Needing a nuke is like destroying the village in order to save it—not very smart. Another reason why this argument is faulty is the gap between human social structure and thinking, and our technological development.

Consider somebody who is 75 years old this year, and grew up in South Dakota. They would have been born in 1908, and could remember World War 1. Imprinted on their brains are changes that we can hardly fathom. They would have seen airplanes, nuclear bombs, men on the moon, pocket calculators, eradication of major diseases, and the growth of the California wine industry. In short technology develops at a certain rate. If we were to put it on a graph we would see that the end of the line, today, is rising sharply.

Most of this technological change has been good; but some including nuclear weapons has not been. Even this would not be a serious problem, if our social structure had evolved at an equal rate. But this is not the case. We do not really understand our relationship to our fellowman, to the fragile world in which we live, and to life and death. Our concepts of good and bad, right and wrong, are unsuited for the nuclear age. If we were to put social development on the same graph with a technological curve, we would find that we are rising much slower. The gap between our technological development, and our ability to understand the results of that technology is growing.

At some point it will become too large and "go critical." Leaders, shakers, and movers are trapped by concepts and abstract theories to an extraordinary degree.

We see in the movie "The Day After" that thermonuclear war has been launched to protect our freedom. The voice from the radio assures us that is done. (Presumably the premier of Russia is saying the same thing to a group of dazed farmers on the plains of the Ukraine.) The problem is that having gone to that length to protect ourselves, we see that there is little left to protect. Conservationist Aldo Leopold once said "Of what good are fourty freedoms without a blank spot on the map." We should substitute with for without, and thermonuclear war for blank spot. Freedom is worth something only in reality not as an abstract concept.

Closer to home and reality than the film; the Cruise and Pershing missiles are being sent to Europe. These are tremendously destabilizing weapons because of their small size, and ease of concealment. This makes verification a serious problem. The Soviet Union will retaliate by parking nuclear subs along the East coast, and heavily deploying nuclear weapons in Eastern Europe. They will also probably switch to launch-on-warning mode, which allows far less reaction time for mistakes. These measures will in turn force us to take additional steps. "And so it goes and so it goes, but where its going no one knows."

Faced with problems like this and a film like "The Day After," many people simply feel that there is nothing they can do. Others go into deep depression, while yet others preach about nuclear war as some abstract concept.

All of these are disempowering ways of dealing with nuclear war. One of the things that sections of the freeze movement are trying to do is "change the game not just the rules." We must look at not only who runs our country and makes decisions, but what are those decisions based on. Even in East Germany an independent peace movement is springing up in response to the understanding of regular people the world over that something concrete must be done to stop the threat of nuclear war. As the computer in the movie "War Games" flashed on its screen, "The only safe move is not to play."

SGA Democracy in Action

The Undergraduate Student Senate at Amherst has recently come under attack for basically two reasons; one, that the Student Senate is unresponsive to student interests, and two, that the Student Senate is run by a group of "radical elites." There also seems to be a gross ignorance of how people become involved with the Student Senate as if the Senate whimsically or politically appoints people to power on an irrational, self serving basis. People who believe the above are completely wrong, that is W-R-O-N-G, wrong!

Dani Burgess

In terms of being unresponsive to student interests, I would like to point out that Student Government leaders (as well as Student Senators in general) were substantially responsible in defeating both the fifty dollar tuition hike as well as the bill to raise the drinking age! Other issues that the Student Senate is concerned with are, the Cage renovation, the Course and Teacher Evaluation Guide, future tuition hikes, WMUA and its financial struggle, oversubscribed classes, students and local government, busses to drinking establishments and shopping centers etc. etc. etc.

A criticism I read recently in a letter to the Collegian was that Student Senate was not concerned about the high cost of rent off campus. The person who wrote this letter didn't take the time to look into what the Student Senate does or s/he would have noticed that this is a primary issue that Student Senate is trying to deal with, essentially through voter registration drives and through encouraging students to run for Amherst Town Meeting. (Please call the SGA President's Office for information on how to do this! It is easy, educational, fun and important!)

In terms of whether or not the Senate is democratic, I have not seen a body with as many or as frequent elections. In other words, the undergraduate Student Senate at Amherst is one of the most Democratic bodies I have ever seen. One hundred and twenty student Senators are elected from within their residential area. The SGA President is elected by a general student election, that is every student has a vote. The speaker and the Treasurer are elected from within the Student Senate. The Committee Chairpeople are elected from within their respective committees and absolutely nowhere can you find a "totalitarian radical regime" in the Student Senate.

If the students will not vote, then by virtue of not voting they are silently asserting that whoever is elected will represent them. It is very rare that more than ten percent of the student vote at any given election, just as it is rare for all available senate seats to be filled. This is not so much a problem of the Senate as it is a problem of the students as a whole.

If you have any desire to "get involved" with the Student Senate there is a potential chance that the senator position for your area is empty. If this is the case, it is relatively simple for you to become a senator. If not, I highly encourage you to run next year.

I have difficulty with people who take time to blindly criticize and label while at the same time they don't vote and don't get involved. Care enough to become a part of the Student Senate. Become involved and be an active, caring and knowledgable student instead of an inactive, apathetic and uncaring student. It makes you feel like you are a part of the decision-making process at UMass and it encourages student goverance and input at the University. By the way, for those of you who might not know, the Student Activities Trust Fund (SATF) generates $1,800,000.00 per year! Students are responsible for the allocation of over $800,000.00! This is not a typo, students control over eight hundred thousand dollars per year. Undeniably, an "awesome" amount of money.

Get involved and utilize some of the gains students won in the sixties and seventies; insure your voice is heard. There are also a number of different University Wide Committees ranging from the Academic Matters Council to the Health Council to the Parking Appeals Board etc. etc., which have student seats, many of which are vacant.

If you want more information on the University Committees, the SATF, the Student Senate or if you just have general questions, please feel free and encouraged to call 545-0341 at the Senate Office between eight and four weekdays, or stop by room 240 of the Student Union.

Republicans get a bum rap

To the Editor,

The members of the University of Massachusetts Republican Club have recently been referred to as, among other things, "blind patriots" and blind supporters of President Reagan's "insane nuclear confrontational politics." In addition to being called insane, the President has been accused of being a perpetrator of "barbaric acts," a deluder of the public, and a "token John Wayne." UMass Republicans have been stereotyped, and have even been called "demented." As a member of the club, I guess I should feel offended, but it is difficult to take such attacks seriously in the face of such immaturity. This name calling and emotional rhetoric is intellectual cowardice, making the perpetrators of it look like the non-thinkers, as opposed to their targets, the Republicans.

Examples of this retreat from argumentive essay into emotional rhetoric abound, the most recent example is Josh Meyer's column of Tuesday, November 22, where a fictional character is used as a vehicle to express the writer's emotional pleas and insults. The heroine of the column is a girl who has just seen The Day After and has become terribly caught up in the movie's horrors. This is only appropriate in that the very nature of the movie is emotional, as it was designed to scare people. In light of this, the irony of Meyer's column is incredible when the girl thinks of the said "paranoia that her President had provoked."

All of this is not to say that nuclear war should not be feared, nor that a certian degree of fear isn't natural, but fear that leads to decisions based on fear is never rational. People being scared into making rash political decisions is very frightening in itself. If we, as a society, cannot rise above our fear to reason, then we will surely perish.

The movie taught us very little, as most people already had a good idea that nuclear war would be utterly devastating. The discussion that followed was truly enlightening and intellectually stimulating, however, as a panel of some of the brightest and most authoritative minds on the subject addressed the problem of how to prevent nuclear war. Meyer's fictional character brushed these great minds aside though, as he writes, ". . .and she listened to the panel discussion where 'great men' on the screen were throwing numbers around like they somehow had the answer to the nuclear madness." She would rather dwell on the horrors than listen to the experts and their various opinions. It made little difference what they had to say, for she had the answers herself. She "knows" that the policies of Reagan and his "miserable cohorts" are "insane" and that she must try and "get the bastards out of office." Unfortunately, perhaps Mr. Meyer has drawn and all too realistic view of how some people reach political conclusions. It is this kind of thinking, or lack thereof, that might lead our nation into that nuclear confrontation that is as feared as the existing policy of deterrence is underminded through so called "peace movements."

As a member of the University of Massachusetts Republican Club, I should like to make a point that I feel is crucial. Our goals are the same as our more liberal friends - peace, freedom, justice, prosperity. etc. Our means of achieving them are different, however. We like to feel that our means are more realistic. We are not "blind patriots," but we do love our country and feel that blind passivism is a more dangerous threat to our existence than say, the nuclear deterrent of the United States.

Surely one of the highest virtues is an open mind to varying points of view. Debate and discussion encourage higher levels of reason. Decisions should not be made entirely out of fear or without examination. In the words of President Franklin D. Roosevelt, "We have nothing to fear but fear itself."

An "Indian" misunderstanding

To the Editor,

On the front page of the Collegian of Wednesday, November 23, I am grievously and repeatedly misquoted. As the issues are sensitive ones, particularly to Native American people, I wish to clarify my positions.

I am quoted as saying that the negative Thanksgiving observance "undermines their Indianness" when I actually said underlines. The negative Thanksgiving is an important symbol of self-awareness, and as such, is a source of strength.

The statement that Connecticut Valley peoples "belonged to no specific tribe" has a connotation very different from what was intended. It is not the case that they lacked effective political and social organization, which is one possible interpretation of the statement. Rather, I was trying to explain that native peoples were not organized by the principles implied by vernacular and Eurocentric uses of the word "tribe," but instead identified themselves with communities.

Central valley peoples did not withdraw "to Connecticut" after 1676; they moved either west toward the Hudson River or, in larger numbers, up the Connecticut River toward Quebec, where they settled north of what is now the Vermont-Quebec border.

There is widespread ignorance about the native peoples of this area, and about their history. I regret that one small opportunity to reduce that ignorance has been thwarted by it.

Philippino lawyer speaks out

By CAMDEN PIERCE
Collegian Staff

The government of the Philippenes has become a "conjugal dictatorship" which is oppressing the people of that nation, said Charita Plana, a Philippene lawyer who spoke yesterday at Amherst College.

But oppression is not new to the people of the Philippenes, its history is one of "occupation, colinization, and domination," Planas said.

Planas has been the only woman ever to hold the position of Director of the Philippene Chamber of Commerce. In 1978, she escaped to the United States after being jailed during the elections where she ran for director of Social Services.

Since 1521, Philippene people have endured nearly 400 years under Spanish colonialists, 48 years of American domination, and 3 and a half years under the Japanese during world War II. In each case, Planas said, the invaders claimed to be the liberators of the Philippene people. "When are we going to do our own liberation by ourselves?," she said.

Though the "liberators' claimed their actions were in the best interests of the Philippene people, Planas said the real reason was the Philippines represent a good source of cheap labor."

The Marcos Government has encouraged American investors to take advantage of the poverty of the Philippene people, Planas said. Ostensibly, the purpose of the policy is to attract foreign capital, Planas said. But its purpose is to solidify its standing with the U.S. government, which supplies the military might that keeps Marcos in power. The Reagan administration is giving $450 million in military aid to the Marcos regime, she said.

The recent assassination of Aquino has turned the middle class against Marcos and has solidified opposition against him. Business people who used to curry the administration's favor "are now leading demonstrations in spite of warnings by Marcos," she said.

But while Planas said there "is no stopping the independence of the people," the problems of her country are profound. Given the present U.S. policies, even if Marcos is deposed, she said it is likely that there "will be a military take-over that will be even more repressive."

Women of the Calabash to perform at Smith

Dedicated to the preservation of traditional African music forms, Women of Calabash, a three piece African ensemble, draws music from Africa, Latin America, the Caribbean and Black America, to expose its audience to new sounds.

According to the ensemble's founder, vocalist and percussionist Madeleine Yayodele Nelson, the group sings and plays types of music people are unfamiliar with using instruments made from natural materials.

The ensemble gets its name from the calabash, a gourd that grows in Africa which is used to make the percussion instrument featured in the ensemble's music. The ensemble also uses instruments made from bamboo and wood.

Nelson said she started the ensemble after working with other percussion ensembles, whose members were predominantly male where she could not be as creative as she wanted to be.

Nelson said she thinks women naturally "bring a different feel" to percussion instruments, but that they traditionally get less recognition for their talents than men.

She played an instrument called the "shekere," a variation of the calabash, which makes a rhythmic, rattling sound, which was easily covered up by the sounds of the other drummers.

"We have been called 'edutainers' by Chuck Davis of the Chuck Davis Dance Company in New York City," she said.

Women of Calabash will perform Friday at 8 p.m. at Sage Hall at Smith College.

Lono: more bad craziness or, Hunter goes to Honolulu

The Curse of Lono* (Bantam)
Hunter S. Thompson and Ralph Steadman
158 pages; $10.95

By NEAL O'SHEA
Collegian Staff

A new Hunter Thompson novel. My first impulse is to rush out and load up on MDA and while driving around Amherst in a huge red convertible, charging the whole thing to the Collegian. No. A clear head must prevail. It is the correct choice as The Curse of Lono is actually a cohesive novel, unlike the almost surreal Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas, or The Great Shark Hunt.

The current round of "Bad Craziness" takes place in Hawaii where Thompson and the crazed English artist Ralph Steadman are observing the Honolulu Marthon at the Expense of Runner Magazine. There are the usual trademarks of drugs (mescaline on a fishing expedition), booze (driving around in a Mustang, drinking gin), and horror (staying in a house that almost washes away).

But this book has more than that. There are historical excerpts of Captain Cook's ill—fated jouney to Hawaii in the 1700's. Cook was mistakenly believed to be the god Lono, but was later disembered by the natives. Thompson works in a similar manner and also becomes ostracized from the island of Kona, where Cook met his death. Thompson clinches it by proclaiming that he is Lono during a crazed frenzy brought on by landing a marlin and clubbing it to death with a huge Somean war club.

One sure thing is that Thompson is slowly changing his pace. Journalism is just too tiring these days. "Journalism is a ticket to ride, to get personally involves in the same news other people watch on TV—which is nice, but it won't pay the rent, and people who can't pay their rent in the 'Eighties are going to be in trouble." Not such great news for people like me, but just about anyone else will have a good time.

The Honolulu Marathon, as seen by the ever-warped Ralph Steadman

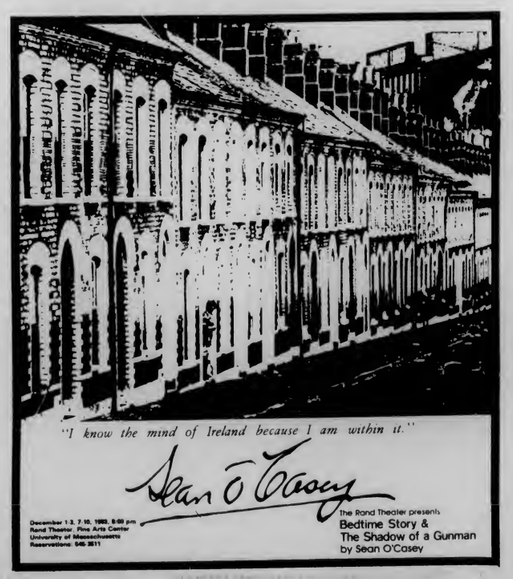
The UMass Department of Theater will present its production of Sean O'Casey's Shadow of a Gunman Dec. 1-3 and 7-10 in the Rand Theater. All performances will begin at 8 p.m. For further information, call the Fine Arts Center Box Office at 545-3511.



Open auditions will be held for the Jacobean tragedy, 'Tis Pity She's a Whore, from 7 p.m. to 10 p.m. on Dec. 4 and 5 in room 204 of the Fine Arts Center. Anyone wishing to audition must sign up for an audition time. For further information, call 545-3490.

The Amherst College Department of Dramatic Arts & Dance will present a Festival of One-Act Plays in Kirby Experimental Theater during the month of December. The student-directed plays include He's Dead All Right, Hopscotch and The Boor, which will be performed Dec. 1-3, The Jealousies of Barbouille and Sister Mary Ignatious Explains It All For You, which will be performed Dec. 5-7 and Impromptu and Cowboys II, to be performed Dec. 9-11. All performances begin at 8 p.m. For further information, call 542-2277.

The Five College Orchestra, under conductor Dennis Burkh, will continue its third season with a concert on Monday Dec. 5 at Chapin Auditorium, Mt. Holoyoke College, and another on Wednesday Dec. 7, at John M. Greene Hall, Smith College. Both concerts will begin at 8 p.m. and are free of charge. For further information, call 256-8316.

Coleman Chamber Competition winners, The Ridge String Quartet, will perform at 8 p.m. on Dec. 2, at the Fine Arts Center. Tickets are available at the Fine Arts Center Box Office, the Springfield Civic Center and at all DATATIX outlets. For further information, call 545-2511.

At Bread & Circus we have the Lowest Natural Food Prices

in Pioneer Valley. We guarantee it.

We will match any natural food price in Pioneer Valley on any item we carry. Or, if you have already bought something at our store and find that it's selling for less elsewhere we will refund the difference.

FARM FRESH MILK

On sale this week: Dell Dale's farm fresh all-natural milk, both homogenized and non-homogenized (Creamline). This milk comes from a special herd of naturally-fed Holstein cows that aren't given any artificial stimulants to increase production. In the non-homogenized variety, the cream is clearly visible at the top, just like the old days. We think this milk is the healthiest and best-tasting milk available.

Special price: $1.89/gal

HOME MADE SAUSAGE

This week, we're having a special on three different varieties of extra lean pork sausage: Italian sausage, hot sausage and garlic and cheese sausage. All are made at the Bread & Circus store, to our exclusive recipes. And we add no MSG, nitrates or nitrites. Our regular price $2.79/lb.

Special price: $1.79/lb

WHOLE WHEAT BREAD

Made especially for Bread & Circus, this stone-ground whole wheat bread is organic. That means it's made from wheat that wasn't grown with pesticides or herbicides. Furthermore, it's all natural—it contains no artificial colors or flavors, no chemical additives, no fillers and no refined sugars. Whole wheat bread is high in fiber and high in nutrition—and it's full of flavor.

Special price: 69¢ one-pound loaf for

ANJOU PEARS

This week, we're featuring a new crop of fancy Anjou pears from Washington State. Besides being sweet and delicious, Anjou pears are high in vitamins B1 and Riboflavin, magnesium and potassium. We usually sell them for 69¢/lb.

Special price: 49¢/lb

LOW FAT YOGURT

This week, Bread & Circus introduces a delicious new line of fruited, low-fat, honey-sweetened yogurt—Sundance yogurt. We're selling four different flavors: spiced apple, wild Maine blueberry, raspberry and strawberry/banana. Made with a high concentration of milk solids, Sundance yogurt is low in calories and high in protein and doesn't contain stabilizers or emulsifiers. Our normal price: 59¢ for an 8 oz. container.

Special price: three for 99¢

WHOLE WHEAT CROISSANTS

All across the country, Americans are discovering how great-tasting hot, buttered croissants can be. Well, this week, we're having a sale on natural buttered whole wheat croissants fresh from our own in-store bakery. These croissants contain no artificial flavors, colors or chemical additives. Our regular price: 60¢ each.

Special price: two for $1.00

Bulk Food Story

At Bread & Circus, we offer approximately 300 different items in bulk—all at exceptionally low everyday prices. Our bulk foods include all kinds of grains and pastas, herbs and spices. Also, we're one of the few stores in the United States with a nitrogen-flushed liquid bulk dispenser. It serves oils, syrups, honeys, vinegars, etc.

Why buy foods from our bulk bins and dispensers? There are many good reasons: 1) You get the product at a rock bottom price, since you're not paying for a fancy package, 2) You buy exactly the amount you need, no more, no less, 3) You see exactly what you're buying— before you buy.

We're proud of our low, everyday bulk food prices and we think you'll be pleased with them too. Here are a just a few examples:

Dry bulk:

Rolled oats	33¢/lb.
Hulled sunflower seeds	89¢/lb.
Pistachios	$3.99/lb.
Miller's bran	27¢/lb.
Short grain brown rice	36¢/lb.
Whole wheat bread flour	34¢/lb.
Popcorn	33¢/lb.
Maple granola (special buy)	99¢/lb.

Liquid bulk:

Grade A maple syrup	$1.45/lb.
Tamari	99¢/lb.
Apple cider vinegar	94¢/lb.
Uncooked clover or wildflower honey	99¢/lb.

OUR GUARANTEE

At Bread & Circus, we have a unique policy—a guarantee without conditions. That's right. If you don't like whatever you buy at Bread & Circus—for any reason—we'll give you a full refund, no questions asked.

Minutemen hang in for first win, 75-73

By GERRY deSIMAS
Collegian Staff

Well, they certainly know how to put on an exciting show. Carl Smith's double-pump fake with two seconds to go gave the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team an exciting 75-73 win over those hustling Wildcats from the University of New Hampshire after the Minutemen had blown a 22 point lead.

UNH led by three, their biggest lead since early in the first half, 73-70 with 1:22 left in the game when sophomore forward John Hempel was fouled as he sank a 10-foot jumper. Hemple sank the foul shot and recovered a UNH turnover with 25 seconds to go when UNH was trying to set up the last shot.

That set up the game-winner to Carl Smith.

The shot saved face for UMass, who was superb in the first half running out to a 46-32 halftime advantage built upon stellar defensive efforts by Edwin Green (three blocks), Donald Russell (three steals) and the hustling play of Craig Smith off the bench.

In the second half, UNH outscored UMass 27-10 over a six minute span to even up the game.

"We were concerned about our mental intensity before the game," UMass Coach Ron Gerlufsen said. "We stopped thinking. We have to learn to be patient offensively. The mental sharpness left us for 10 minutes in the second half.

"We are not a team used to playing with a big lead coming into the second half." That is true and UMass got sloppy and UNH was right back in the ball game. With the hot shooting of senior Al McClain leading the way and a pressuring half court press that forced numerous turnovers (and left Carl Smith without a player to inbounds the ball to three times as the five second limit expired) killed the big lead.

"I'm a little disappointed in our play," Gerlufsen said. "We just didn't handle it mentally."

'However, when the Minutemen got their game in gear, they walked all over New Hampshire. "We played very well in stretches," the coach said. The first big run came in after UMass struggled to take the lead on a Braun layup at 21-20. In the next four minutes, Massachusetts proceeded to outscore the Wildcats 11-2 and was in command for the first half.

UMass opened the second half, in a situation that they haven't seen much in past years, with a big lead. They increased to 22 points with hoops by Neysmith and Russell and then they fell asleep.

Dan Nolan, the game's high scorer with 24, started to gun and it didn't help when Green had to be sat down with his fourth foul. And when Nolan took a break, McClain shot them in from the outside.

All which led up to the designed play after UMass took the ball with 25 seconds to go and Carl Smith took it to the hoop in a crowd of Wildcats.

"Carl always knows the situation," Gerlufsen said. "Being the smart player he is, he went to the hole," And instead of a bitter opening game loss, UMass is 1-0 for the first time in five years.

Neysmith, Russell, and Hempel all scored 16 for UMass with Hempel pulling in nine rebounds. McClain hit 18 for UNH, which drops to 0-2. UMass can move to 2-0 with a win Saturday against Bentley at 1:30 p.m. in the Cage.

Tough loss for Hoopsters

By ADAM NAZIMOWITZ
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's basketball team gave a good effort but came out on the losing side once again as Big East powerhouse St. Johns defeated the Minutewomen by a score of 71-64 at Curry Hicks Cage last night.

The Minutewomen were led by center Karen Damminger's 22 point, five rebound performance. She filled in well starting for the injured Kelly Collins, who will return for the hoopwomen's next game.

She was supported by Barbara Hebel who scored 14 points and added four assists. Rebecca Kucks had a perfect night shooting four for four from the field and five for five from the foul line to collect 13 points while also pulling down ive boards.

"It was a good effort. There were a few crucial situations where we missed a few free throws and had some costly turnovers, and that hurt us. The pace of the game took a lot out of us, but all in all we're very pleased," Coach Barbara Stevens said.

Both teams came out at the start of the game shooting cold. The Minutewomen's defense was tough and they forced St. Johns outside and into a lot of turnovers (25 altogether), while building up an early 13-6 lead.

But veteran Coach Don Perrelli quickly called timeout to re-group his experienced squad. They responded by closing the lead to 13-12, as they began to turn things around and force UMass to make mistakes. However, the Minutewomen held tough and did stay ahead throughout most of the first half until the last four minutes when St. Johns pulled ahead to take a 39-32 halftime lead.

In the second half, Hebel came out and hit three straight shots to pull UMass within 41-38. But the young, enthusiastic Minutewomen were just overpowered by the veteran squad, which began to run its fastbreak well and hit their shots and went up by a 49-40 count.

St. Johns added to this lead, but the Minutewomen made a good attempt at a comeback, led by Damminger's inside game, only to get into foul trouble and end up coming short by seven points.

Faye Gerald led St. Johns with 18 points and some good shooting. Senior center Dianne Pugh added 13 points, while pulling down nine rebounds and controlling the front of the basket.

"Karen played well for us," Stevens said. "Her main problem is getting into foul trouble, but she stayed out of it tonight and played good inside and off the boards. Our main problem was that we couldn't get anything going offensively for a long stretch. If we kept the momentum going, we would have done better, but they played well."

The hoopwomen bring their disappointing 0-3 record back into the Cage on Saturday night as they try to rebound against the University of Vermont, who they defeated last year by a score of 63-59.

Hoover leads UM to first win

By ED HAYWARD
Collegian Correspondent

Freshman Mike Hoover's three first place victories paced the University of Massachusetts men's swimming team to a narrow 57-56 win over Tufts University yesterday at Boyden pool.

On the victory, Coach Russ Yarworth said, "I am pleased with the way the guys swam today; we beat a really good team. I can't think of a better way to begin the season. It's a promising start."

Hoover won the 200 Individual Medley, the 200 Breaststroke, and swam a strong leg for the 400 Medley Relay team which defeated Tufts by a wide margin. Of the talented freshman, Yarworth said "He swam an excellent meet. It's easy to see he is one of the best in New England this year."

In other events, Chris Porter won the 200 freestyle, Chris Clarke won the 200 butterfly, and Mark Surrette won the 200 backstroke. These three also teamed with Hoover in the 400 medley relay victory. In both the 1000 and 500 freestyle UMass swimmers placed second and third to further aid the team's cause.

Diver John Macurdy also played an important part in the win. Since both the swimming and diving results are used in determining the final score, losses in the two diving events could have shifted the outcome either way. But Macurdy took first in both the one and two meter competitions as he led the divers to a 12-6 triumph.

The victory was an upset of sorts for UMass Yarworth said. "This is the first time since 1978 that we've beaten Tufts. It's all the more important since they finished second in New England last year." Because of these two factors Yarworth said that this victory is the biggest of his career.

"This team is really pulling together and developing a new and positive identity," Yarworth said. "Our present goal is to go 3-0 in the meets before winter break." Yarworth's squad is to go 3-0 in the meets before winter break."

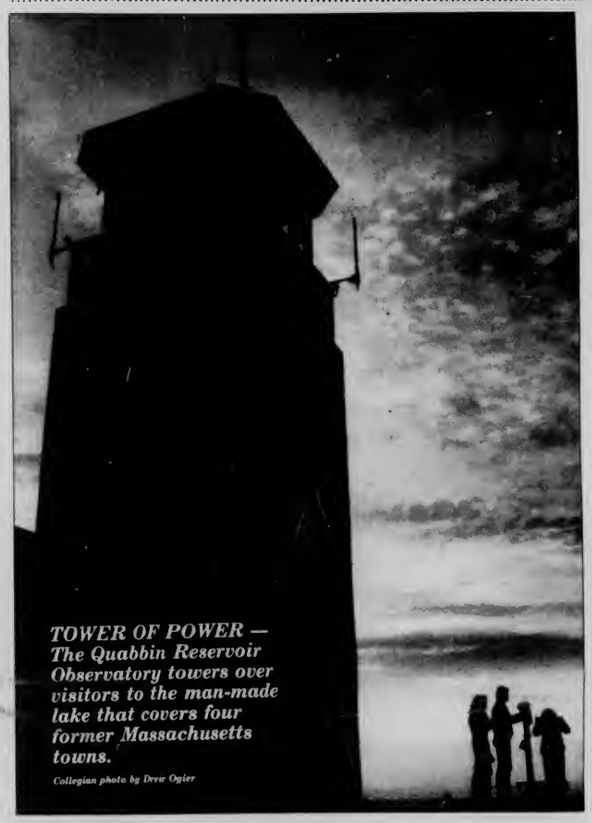
Just a few thoughts...

Football is almost over and we still have the inside track as the Steelers and the Vikings are blowing their leads. It's fortunate that the NFL does have these races because of the strike last year. Many thought a lackluster season could have spelled big trouble for the NFL...Well I finally, after 7 weeks, picked a correct Patriots game. Thank you, New York Jets. Tony Eason just could not handle the Sack Exchange and the swirling winds of Shea...The big match of the year will be on Dec. 11, as Dallas hosts Washington. These two teams would not exactly go to the prom with each other, so look for a lot of blood.

Just when I thought the Celtics were about to runaway with a good start they go on a four game losing streak, highlighted by two losses to the Knicks, who have the best defense but the worst offense in the NBA...the 76ers, meanwhile, are still doing quite well, but not the class of the league as they were last year. In fact, no one seems to want to be the NBA's #1 team...But watch out for the Dallas Mavericks. They're off to a good start and they're in a pretty weak division...Can't say enough on the hideous officiating so far. In all fairness, it is not their fault. They were pressed into service which they really weren't ready for.

The Bruins are back in the first after a slight skid. Thank God for the New Jersey Devils...This new overtime is quite stupid. 5 minutes and that's it. Why not have two 5 minute periods and then a shootout...The hockey regular season, similar to basketball, has lost its luster due to the expanded playoffs.

On to more exciting things: college hoop is back, and looks really good. North Carolina is the early favorite, along with Kentucky, who looked mighty tough in destroying arch-rival Louisville. UCLA should also come back after its obscurity due to probation...Who is Anthony "Spud" Webb, and why are we cheering for him? All Mr. Webb did was score 18 points in the Tip-Off Classic victory over Houston. The catch? Webb is 5'6" (There's hope for me, yet.)



What a game between Nebraska and Oklahoma! The Huskers had to fight to survive this battle, 28-21. And tell me that there was no interference on the next to last play of the game. I think the men in stripes were also thinking of a national championship...Meanwhile, Mike Rozier continues to clean off a spot in his trophy case for the beloved Heisman. He is having an awesome (UMass student, or what) year...Should be a good lineup of bowl games on Jan. 2nd, highlighted by Nebraska - Miami in the Orange Bowl...Also look for BC to take the Vatican Bowl. In fact, other clubs deserve a better shot than the Fightin' Irish..Speaking of BC, did you see how they made over 2 million for their TV games, with another $600,000 coming from the bowl game? They're sleeping well at Chestnut Hill tonight.

Finally, some good news and bad news from the past weekend. I really enjoyed the Skins game with those legendary golfers. Seeing Palmer sink a 35 foot putt for $100,000 made for an exciting tourney...Did anyone sneeze Friday night? If so, you missed the Larry Holmes-Marvis Frazier debacle. No more need be said.

Psychological motives may be behind dorm fires

By ANNE McCRORY
Collegian Staff

The number of suspects has been reduced to three in the 16 incident Crampton dormitory arson case, at the University of Massachusetts, Rosemary Tarantino of the Hampshire County District Attorney's Office said Wednesday night.

Tarantino's statement followed the second meeting of Crampton residents with University and fire officials, where State Trooper Jay Bowman elaborated on Tuesday's desktop fire.

Bowman said that fire, discovered by a second floor resident who said she was returning from a shower, must have been extinguished "within 30 seconds" after it was set to have caused the minimal resulting damage.

"There are psychological reasons the fire did not go further," Bowman said, noting it is "possible" the fire was lit and put out by the same person.

Meanwhile, the Undergraduate Student Senate unanimously passed a motion to allocate $150 to create a Student Network United to Fight Fires Fund. The fund will solicit donations of $50 from area governments and $10 from dorm councils and registered student organizations for an up to $1,000 reward for information leading to the arrest and conviction of the Crampton arsonist.

Speakers at Wednesday night's meeting seeking to reassure the tired and anxious residents included Director of Housing Services Joseph Zannini, Director of Public Safety Gerald O'Neil, the state fire marshal, Amherst fire chief, Environmental Health and Safety and University Mental Health Services officials.

This meeting followed the first day of 24-hour security measures which did not prevent Wednesday's 11:29 a.m. toilet paper fire.

That fire, occurring in a second floor bathroom, was discovered by students who notified a security guard. Though the guard extinguished the fire and radioed police, the dorm alarm was not pulled, according to Philip Cavanaugh, assistant director of Public Safety.

While some students expressed relief that "the awful noise" of the fire alarm did not sound because of the small fire, others were angry their vote of the previous night to pull the alarm for all fires had been ignored.

"It upsets me because we took a vote last (Tuesday) night to pull the alarm no matter how big the fire and she (the guard) took it into her own jurisdiction," said Crampton resident Donna Murphy, 18.

Students also expressed dismay at a statement made by Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Dennis Madson in Wednesday's Collegian, which quoted him as saying there would be no housing fee refunds for Crampton residents, although accommodations would be made for those wanting to move.

But Zannini said Wednesday night "there is a process" by which refunds could be obtained, and agreed to meet today with residents who have a petition with 130 signatures to work on a proposal.

Two other Southwest fires of suspicious origin were also reported Wednesday according to UMass police.

Cance dormitory was evacuated at 1:43 a.m. Wednesday when a fourth floor trash room fire was discovered and put out by residents, police said. There were no injuries or damages, though the smoke was fairly heavy, police said.

Student senate concered over worker's health

By LISA MARIE CANTWELL
Collegian Staff

The Undergraduate Student Senate approved last night the development of a task force aimed at investigating the many problems caused by the asbestos levels found at the University Store, including the store's current move to new locations as a result of the danger.

A September 27th air sample conducted by the UMass Department of Environmental Safety and the State Asbestos Commission revealed a "cause for concern and the store was advised to remove it as soon as possible," said Cindy Lembeck, chair of the rents and fees committee which is now investigating the issue.

"People who work there are worried about their health," said Paul Gosselin, a commuter area senator, who, along with several other senate members, expressed concern about the long-range health implications of the University Store's workers. "You might not hear about workers becoming ill for another 10 to 20 years," he said. Asbestos has been identified as a highly carcinogenic fiber by science researchers.

Another central concern "is the loss of study space" as a result of the move, Lembeck said. The University Store has now relocated a portion of its merchandise in the Cape Cod Lounge and also plans to utilize the Student Union Ballroom. The store is expected to occupy those spaces until the end of January but "certain people were advised not to schedule anything in the Student Union Ballroom for part of spring semester," said Eric Nietche, the senate treasurer.

The estimated loss of revenue for the store is $425,000 Lembeck said. According to University's Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA) sources, the total cost of the asbestos removal is $600,000.

Alternative study spaces are being planned, and the Coffee Shop will be opened from 5 p.m. to 11 p.m. to accommodate students.

The senate also reviewed grammatical errors in the new SGA constitution. Ratification of the document is expected to be completed by next February. Chancellor Joseph Duffey has extended his original December deadline to March and the UMass Board of Trustees will receive the document at that time.

In other business, the senate approved a $1,000 grant to the UMass Music Theatre Guild to fund The Rocky Midnight Experience, a musical production planned for next semester. According to guild representative Gregg Spisak, the group's request for permission to use the original title "The Rocky Horror Picture Show" was turned down by copyright holders at 20th Center Fox. However, "the entire production will be almost exactly the same," he said.

Yale prof speaks on fifth dimension

Theory involves gravity, electromagnetic forces

By TAMI BORTON
Collegian Staff

The possible existence of a fifth dimension may explain theories of gravity and electromagnetism under a unified theory, a visiting professor from Yale University said Wednesday at the University of Massachusetts.

Dr. Alan Chodos, who has been teaching and studying at Yale for seven years, said during a physics colloquim that the quest for such a unified theory provides the motivation for studying additional dimensions.

Nearly 150 people listened to the talk, entitled "Life in More than Four Dimensions," which used algebraic explanations of existing physics theories to verify a relationship between gravity and electromagnetic forces in five dimensions.

The four existing dimensions used to explain natural phenomena are width, height, depth and time.

Applying physicist Albert Einstein's Theory of Relativity to five dimensions, an equation explaining the existence of electromagnetic forces is reached which serves as the basis for the relationship.

Chodos said "the fifth dimension is small enough not to be seen and its size is dependent on the magnitude of the electromagnetic charge at a given time." Again, using physics equations, he verified this relationship, and its variability over time.

Right after the "Big Bang," a theory explaining the birth of the universe as an explosion, all dimensions were the same size, he said.

As the four confirmed dimensions expanded, the fifth dimension shrank. This would explain the present 40-to-one magnitude difference between gravity and electromagnetism, Chodos said. Equations also support Chodos's hypothesis that the explosion was linear, rather than from one point, as many physicists believe, he said.

The fifth dimension turns back on itself, just as a circle does, and is wrapped within the visible dimensions in linear fashion, he said.

DEATH DEMONSTRATION — Beirut, Lebanon. Shiite women hold up "Death to USA" signs Wednesday at the Iranian embassy in Beirut during a Shiite demonstration over Lebanon's decision to sever diplomatic relations with Iran.

Druse attack closes Beirut airport

BEIRUT, Lebanon (AP) — Shellfire closed Beirut airport Wednesday, and Druse gunners threatened fierce attacks on Lebanese army positions at the terminal, harbor, power stations, schools and peacekeeping bases.

No casualties were reported at the airport, where the U.S. Marine base came under shelling for a third day, but Druse attacks on army positions in Christian east Beirut Tuesday killed six civilians and wounded 30.

In a written statement, the Progressive Socialist Party of Druse leader Walid Jumblatt accused the Lebanese army and Christian militias in Beirut of shelling Druse mountain villages.

It demanded they dismantle their batteries and clear out of positions protecting the airport, the harbor, power stations, schools and from multinational peacekeeping force garrisons.

The Druse statement urged civilians to avoid army and Christian militia garrisons and vehicles "because they are all going to be the target of fire."

Printers blockade newspaper plant

WARRINGTON, England (AP) — Some 4,500 picketing printers and leftist supporters blockading a newspaper plant battled with 2,000 police early today, causing more than 30 injuries.

Inside the besieged plant, however, operations continued and the first editions moved out under police protection.

A spokesman at Cheshire county police headquarters said 21 police and 12 pickets were injured and 73 pickets arrested in the melee outside the Messenger group plant in this northwest England town.

The protest lasted all day Tuesday and continued past dawn Wednesday, with pickets hurling rocks, bottles and cans and lashing out with fists and feet as officers linked arms in a human wall to push them back from the plant entrance.

The violence ebbed after daybreak, but Messenger chairman Selim Shah said he was prepared for a two-day siege.

Military plans headquarters on ship

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Pentagon plans to set up a small floating forward headquarters in the Middle East by the end of the year to help protect U.S. interests in the Persian Gulf and Indian Ocean regions.

A staff of up to 20 officers and men will be placed aboard a U.S. Navy ship operating with a small flotilla of warships called the Middle East Force, the Pentagon announced Tuesday.

AROUND THE NATION

Civil Rights Commission extended

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Reagan revived the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights on Wednesday after waiting until virtually the last moment to sign legislation reducing his power to influence the panel.

Reagan named the commission's last chairman, Clarence M. Pendleton, to serve on the reconstituted panel and said outgoing staff director Linda Chavez should resume her position, although her appointment is subject to concurrence by the full commission. Technically, the commission died at midnight Tuesday. The bill signed by Reagan revives it, but with greater congressional — and less presidential — control over its makeup.

Farmers paid to not produce milk

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Reagan, trying to curb the burgeoning cost of the nation's surplus dairy production, has signed into law a bill that will for the first time pay dairy farmers not to produce milk.

The White House announced the signing without comment late Tuesday, just two hours after Reagan met with farmstate congressmen lobbying for the legislation. The bill also included tobacco provisions and a drought feed aid program.

Reagan's approval was hailed as a step toward cutting the $2.6 billion annual government cost of buying up surplus dairy products. It is cheaper to pay farmers not to produce milk than to buy it up afterwards, they reasoned.

Bus collides with truck, killing six

LIVINGSTON, Texas (AP) — A Continental Trailways bus carrying 12 people rammed the rear of a truck before dawn Wednesday and plunged 40 feet nose first into a muddy creek, killing six passengers and injuring the others.

Several of the passengers were pinned in the mangled wreckage for 90 minutes as rescue workers cut the top off the bus and climbed inside, officials said.

Four people, including the driver, were taken 75 miles by helicopter to a Houston hospital after the 5:30 a.m. accident five miles north of this southeastern Texas city.

Truck driver Richard Paloma Garcia, 43, of Livingston, said he had just pulled out from his home onto U.S. 59 when he was hit in the rear. He was not injured, and said he ran down th embankment to the bus.

"Everything down there was quiet. I talked to one lady and asked if they needed any help and she said some people were hurt," Garcia said. "They weren't talking. They weren't in any shape to talk."

Garcia said he ran back to the road and tried to hail help from passing cars, but none would stop.

Condominium controls become law

BOSTON (AP) — Statewide protections for tenants in apartments being converted to condominiums were signed into law Wednesday by Gov. Michael Dukakis, over the real estate industry's opposition.

Boycotting the signing ceremony were industry representatives, who had worked with the administration for a compromise but in the end opposed the bill that Dukakis signed.

"A lot of people in the real estate community were not happy with the final product, but I must say it's a better product because of their participation in it," Dukakis said.

"My own feeling is it's essential. It's desirable, and I don't think it's going to have a serious effort on our ability to produce good housing for people in the state," he said.

Rape shield law protects New Bedford victim

FALL RIVER (AP) — A Superior Court judge Wednesday denied a defense request to interview the victim of a gang rape before the trial of six men charged in the crime.

"I simply don't have the power to grant any such deposition," Judge William Young said after hearing arguments from attorneys representing six men charged in the March 6 gang rape at Big Dan's tavern in New Bedford.

"We have never spoken to her. We have never seen her," attorney Kenneth Sullivan told Judge William Young in asking for permission to interview the victim. "If this woman is going to testify in February, is there any reason why she can't testify under the controlled environment under the superintendency of this court? What is the harm in it?"

Sullivan represents John Cordiero, one of four men charged with rape.

Pat Ellis, an assistant district attorney, argued against the defense request, saying the state rape shield law prevents victims from courtroom harassment.

Northampton landlord convicted in fatal fire

NORTHAMPTON (AP) — A landlord convicted of involuntary manslaughter charges for failing to provide proper fire safety measures in a house where a tenant died is scheduled to be sentenced today in Hampshire Superior Court.

A jury found Robert Niquette Sr., 52, of Ware, guilty of involuntary manslaughter Tuesday.

He was convicted of contributing to the death of James Tiberio Jr., 21, of Granby, who died in a Jan. 1 fire in a Granby home owned by Niquette. Involuntary manslaughter carries a maximum sentence of 20 years in a state prison.

William Collins, assistant district attorney for Hampshire and Franklin counties, told Judge Herbert Travers that Niquette caused the death by improperly installing a wood stove and failing to follow building codes requiring a second exit from an apartment and other safety measures.

Committee searching for new provost...again

By STEPHEN HOWE
Collegian Staff

For the second time in a year, a chancellor's search committee has started receiving and processing applications for the position of provost at the University of Massachusetts.

About 50 people have applied for the provost position so far, search committee chair Richard Stein said, and the number of candidates is expected to grow to more than 100 before the search ends.

The provost supervises academic programs and faculty at the University, and Stein said he expects a lengthy search because the committee is determined to find a well-qualified candidate.

"We want a person who exhibits leadership," Stein said. "We want a person who will stay around a while."

Candidates should have strong academic and administrative backgrounds and should be able to "make difficult decisions such as what (academic) programs should be expanded and what programs should be contracted," Stein said.

Because the new provost will play a major role in shaping the future of UMass, Stein said the University is employing Herdick and Struggles, Inc., an executive search organization which has found upper level administrators for Harvard University, Clark University and the Rhode Island School of Design.

The University ran a provost search last year which cost $14,000. The search proved fruitless when the top candidate found a job at another school before UMass could notify him of the offer here. Stein said Herdick and Struggles, Inc. should help make this search more successful.

The University has not had a permanent provost since late 1982, when Loren Baritz resigned. UMass professor Dean Alfange took the position until June 1983 and Samuel F. Conti will hold the position in an acting position until a new provost is found.

Many changes await a new provost, Stein said.

"It's estimated that in the next eight to 10 years about one-third of the faculty will be retired," and the new provost will play a large role in the rehiring, he said.

The new provost will also have to manage the implementation of the general education curriculum requirements if they are approved by the faculty senate, Stein said.

Stein said he is very optimistic about the University's ability to attract qualified candidates for the job.

"I think most people visualize (UMass) as the top public university in the Northeast," he said. "Many large universities are phasing out departments where we are expanding."

Woman gathers data at UM

By DAVID SUMMERSBY

Women On Campus

For four years as a student at the University of Massachusetts, Hannah Hosom has been doing what she loves best: getting information to the people.

As the UMass Information Data Bank Coordinator (IDB) and a former news editor for the Collegian, Hosom likes to know what is going on and thinks it is important for other people to know too.

"If you know the right person to talk to or where to go to get information, it makes life much easier," she said.

Her job involves gathering information from groups and offices across campus, as well as community information, and then communicating it to students upon demand in the Dean of Students office from 8:30 a.m. to 9 p.m.

For the most commonly asked questions such as pool hours or legal and health information, Hosom runs and writes the script for the taped phone answering service called TIPS.

She also helps prepare the student telephone directories, registration updates, and is now working on an emergency loan brochure due to come out soon, she said.

Helping her control this vast flow of information are 10 staff members, whom she hires, and Gladys Rodriguez, assistant to the Dean.

"I enjoy gathering information and putting it out so people are aware," she said. "Since the University is so huge it is easy to get confused."

Although Hosom looks favorably on her stint as a reporter, she said she enjoys her current job more because she can see tangible results.

"At IDB I know I am helping people because there are hundreds of callers every week, but at the Collegian you knew many times people were not reading your stories and that was frustrating," she said.

Hosom said the experience gained through extracurricular activities at the University is invaluable.

"The University can offer you real life experience. It is like a training ground," she said. "It enables you to handle what happens in the future," she said.

"I have worked with and interviewed many people and the experience has been very valuable," she said.

MAGAZINE TECHNIQUES — Speaker Ellen McCracken lectures Wednesday about advertising methods used in magazines aimed at women.

Magazines prey on women

By ANNEMARIE MALEY
Collegian Correspondent

Women's magazines exist more for advertising than for editorial content, said Ellen McCracken, an associate professor of comparative literature at the University of Massachusetts in a lecture Wednesday entitled "Mass Media: What are They Saying about Us."

"Women do most of the buying in society so publications are created with that consuming function in mind," said McCracken, who is conducting a three-year study on advertising techniques in women's magazines.

"Unfortunately, this reinforces a woman's single importance as a consumer" and undermines her intellectual capacities, she said.

McCracken said one magazine technique is known as "covert advertising," and she gave several examples.

"Advertorials are designed to fool the audience," she said referring to a feature in Teen magazine called "Dear Beauty Editor."

In this feature, beauty and fashion questions are answered with specific endorsements for products advertised elsewhere in the magazine, she said.

Another method of integrating editorial and advertising content is a technique called "subliminal synergism," created by the publishers of New Woman magazine. In this technique, an editorial or feature page is highlighted with a color which reflects the color scheme on the opposing advertising page. This technique directs the reader's eye from one page to the next and the creators of it claim that advertisers get two ad pages for the price of one, she said.

While advertisements compose two thirds of women's magazines, these forementioned tactics increase the advertising content to nearly 90 percent.

"What I object to is that there's deception involved when one thing is labeled as another. The editorial content material is separate from the advertisement, but there's really a lot of advertising in the editorials," McCracken said. McCracken also emphasized the interesting interplay of magazines, attractiveness and their "ability to put women down."

"The most salient advertising technique is 'induced insecurities'," she said.

Advertisers accomplish this through an implicit or explicit male voyeur in the advertisement.

"Judgement is passed according to the woman's outer visual appearance. There's a real effort to 'undercut' women, then offer remedies to their 'problems' through the purchase of specific products," McCracken said.

"Even when we decode their real messages, magazines are still pleasurable," McCracken said.

UMass Police report theft in dorm

A sum of $99 in cash was reported stolen from a room in John Quincy Adams dormitory shortly before 12:30 a.m. Wednesday. Police said a resident had left her room on the 17th floor for a short time and upon return discovered that her money, which had been on the top of her desk, was gone.

University of Massachusetts Police responded to a report of a suspicious person in Crampton dormitory at 6:30 a.m. Tuesday. According to police, the male subject had been trying to get into a dorm room and apparently had had a key. Police were unable to apprehend the subject.

Input desired for Duffey's report card

By JOHN O'CONNELL
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey is being evaluated by the Board of Trustees, and student trustee Charlene Allen wants students to comment.

Allen, who as Student Government Association (SGA) co-President is a member of the Board of Trustees, said the evaluation is a routine yearly event, but "this one is especially important for (Chancellor) Duffey because it's his first one."

"I'm trying to get a well-rounded viewpoint," Allen said, "and that means more than SGA officers who have only dealt with him on student government issues."

Trustees will present their individual comments on the performance of Duffey and University President David C. Knapp to the evaluation committee at the Dec. 6 board meeting, but, Allen said, "as a student trustee, I have a responsibility to give a student view and not just my own."

Allen said any student who have formed an opinion of Duffey based on his public activities and what they have read in the press, and students who have dealt with Duffey on specific issues should come by the SGA President's office on the fourth floor of the Student Union.

"I'd like to know the outcome of those matters and how competent they felt (Duffey) was," she said.

Congratulations. You've just become a better photographer.

No need to change your equipment or your technique ...just try the new family of Kodacolor VR films.

Advances in color print film technology can help you get the best color pictures ever from Kodak films. Try all four new films in your 35 mm camera...and be a better photographer!

Kodak redefines sharpness. Kodacolor VR 100 film is the sharpest color negative film we've ever made. Ideal for big blowups with top quality.

Great for close-ups, anything where detail is important.

Kodak redefines versatility. Kodacolor VR 200 film has all the sharpness, fine grain, and color saturation you got with Kodacolor II film—with twice the speed. Great all-around performer.

Kodak redefines fast action. Kodacolor VR 400 film has wide exposure latitude, plus color that's even more saturated on underexposures, and grain that's even finer than Kodacolor 400 film. Ideal for stopping sports action, even with long telephoto lenses.

Kodak redefines low light. Kodacolor VR 1000 film is the fastest color print film in the world, for good pictures in low light, and when you need very high shutter speeds to stop action. An advanced, new emulsion technology enables the film to capture more light without the grain and loss in sharpness you'd normally expect with such a fast film! Try all four new films...and see all the ways you can be a better photographer!

Students befriend children

By RITA MURPHY
Collegian Staff

Some University of Massachusetts students spend their free time studying, partying or just resting. Other students spend their spare moments being special friends to area children who for various reasons need companionship.

The Companion Program in Amherst is made up of area volunteers who spend several hours each week with a little friend seeing a movie, playing games, or just talking, said MaryJane Shannon, a UMass intern in the Companion Program.

The program has been in existence since 1975, and offers adults and children the opportunity to participate "in a one-to-one relationship with one another," Shannon said.

Currently, about 25 children have been matched with an adult companion through the program. Although technically the program helps people from three to 19 years of age find companions, the majority of those in need of older friends are about seven or eight years old.

Many of the adults in the program are UMass or Amherst College students.

"Sometimes students get really involved in school. The program offers them a release from their schedule. It's fun and enjoyable, and for students it offers a break from school," Shannon said.

Not anyone can be a companion. The program screens potential companions and asks for references. All candidates must also be interviewed by someone in the program's office.

Shannon is one of those who conducts interviews.

"The big companion must be willing to spend three to five hours a week with their little companion and must be willing to commit themselves to it for nine months," she said.

Jewish sectors discussed

By RONDA APPLEBAUM

Social stress between Jews of different European origin in Israel dates back to the founding of that country after World War II, and continues today in many forms, a visiting Israeli professor said Tuesday in a speech at the University of Massachusetts.

Eugene Weiner, sociology professor at the University of Haifa in Israel and a visiting professor of religion and Zionism at Boston University, discussed the roots of conflict between the Sephardim, Jews of Spanish origin, and the Ashkenazim, who came from parts of Europe other than Spain. He also spoke about the ongoing social stresses in Israel.

The Sephardim left Spain during the Inquisition, a period of intense religious persecution, and settled in the area which is now Israel in the 19th century, Weiner said. They had an enormous sense of pride and a strong religious identity, including their own prayer book and rituals, he said.

The Ashkenazim who settled in Israel were Westernized and looked down on what they perceived as the "primitiveness of the Sephardic Jews," Weiner said. This stigma continues today, he said. Since Sephardim were often laborers with little education, many Ashkenazik educators stereotype Sephardi youth and tell them to take vocational training instead of pursuing higher education, Weiner said.

The differences between the two groups continue through the holocaust experience of World War II, Weiner said.

The Sephardim has "less animosity" than the Ashkenazim because they did not have to face the intolerance that the Ashkenazim did, and "they don't identify with the Holocaust mentality because it is not really part of their history," Weiner said.

Weiner also emphasized that Israel is a country with a society that not only has internal difficulties but is also "a society that lives in a perpetual state of stress because of the constant possibility of war."

He said the average male in Israel serves in the army for seven years, and it is common to find fathers and sons fighting in the same war. Since almost everyone has been influenced by the wars, "people in Israel are highly traumatized," Weiner said.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

The Quabbin should be wild

As if there isn't enough sliding by in the world — at this and every moment — making one wince with each scanning of a newspaper, one has to be exposed to an article such as "Public To Get Further Access To Quabbin" which appeared on page three of the Daily Collegian, Thursday, November 17.

Assuming that the author of the article is naive in the ways of journalistic purpose, thereby explaining the article's lack of insight and depth, and resulting one-dimensionality and one-sidedness, one can reason out the article's appearance but not its appearance. For the reporter, his naivete yields his innocence. Blame falls to the reporter's editor, whoever he or she may be, for allowing such a piece to see print in such a state.

Stephen Murphy

It is in quite the impoverished state, beginning with the completely distorted title: "Public To Get..." The slight information we are given does make one thing clear; that the ideas expressed within the article (as quoted from a WFCR news magazine) are proposals and nothing more, with no one getting anything. Title-writers ought to read articles through prior to their titling. After all, sensationalism begins with misleading headlines, and one would hate to think that the Collegian would wallow so low.

If I may proceed, point by point, righting wrongs:

1). A Landscape Architecture professor (Larry Klar) and a Civil Engineering professor (Peter Murphy) have "outlined some ideas for future renovation" in the form of "sport packages" in a reservoir known for its abundance and variety of wildlife, a distinction evolving out of Quabbin's wide variation in habitat and relative inaccessibility by man. Two sins here. First of all, where do a Landscape Architecture professor and a Civil Engineering professor get off believing that they know anything at all of forestry, wildlife management, natural resources or of nature itself, least of all interfering with an ecosystem as fragile and unique as Quabbin's. Secondly, the above point withstanding, why would anyone, as Klar and Murphy have done, want to introduce waterskiing, swimming, canoeing, sailing, camping, and increased motorboating and pollution to an area already suffering the havoc of acid rain, especially when there exist some eighty-five Massachusetts state parks offering similar "sport packages?" Is grant money that abundant?

2.) Quabbin Reservoir does not offer "a variety of watersport activities." The Metropolitan District Commission (MDC), the officials-cum-caretakers of Quabbin, allow fishing in a restricted Massachusetts state fishing license. Period.

3.) Landscape Architecture professor Klar took "a survey of almost 1000 Quabbin visitors" several years ago which "indicated respondents were in favor of many activities not permitted there." A survey of almost a 1000. Quabbin received 310,000 visitors in 1979 alone according to MDC figures. At point-three percent of one year's visiting population could Klar have cut the slice any thinner?

4.) Klar's statements on pollution: "(But) Quabbin is so large that it would dilute any contamination from swimming to the point where it's essentially the same as background" and "Other things, like motorboating with the little bit of oil that gets in the water, just doesn't seem to matter." It is years of thinking along these lines that has carried us head-on into acid rain toxicity, high PCB levels and outcast nuclear wastes. Quabbin is the largest body of untreated drinking water in the country. If the water should even become slightly contaminated chemical treatment would become necessary at an initial cost of between $75 and $100 million to be paid by the users of the water, metropolitan Boston. Boston already has enough problems.

Evidently, professors Klar and Murphy should either conduct some serious research on the many possible consequences of their proposed actions, meet with a learned naturalist, or hike alone through any of the more remote regions of Quabbin, seeing through sound, feeling and wonder as well as through vision, allowing Quabbin to speak for itself. As one of the few wilderness island-worlds available to wildlife, naturalists and in many ways to the Earth herself – Quabbin Reservoir should remain as is.

Stephen Murphy is a UMass student

Sound off!!!
With a letter to the editor

Which day is it, before or after?

It's a week later and I'm expecting A.B.C. to announce a sequel. Seriously, the most unusual aspect to The Day After is that it depicted a nuclear war as somewhat survivable. No way: the world would be an uninhabitable wasteland after such a war. How does such a myth persist in the face of the dark, cold, deathly truth that there will indeed be no survivors in the event of a nuclear war!

Charles Francis Carroll

Despite the film's minimizing the bombs' aftermath, the sequence of events leading up to the outbreak of the war were all too believable, all too true as the deployment of nuclear missiles is taking place in Europe. The realism of the scenario, from Germany to Kansas, made the film important, more important than the usual escapist horror movie. For, after all, that is what The Day After was, the latest in a series of similar thrillers such as Special Bulletin on N.B.C. and The War Game produced by the B.B.C.

"TV's Nuclear Nightmare" had an abundance of monsters that still haunt us a week later. Of course, the exchange of nuclear weapons was the absolute monstrosity, and, a week later, the threat of nuclear war is all the more real and no less a monster. But, the monster in The Day After who frightened me most, even more than the all-too-familiar voice of the president propagandizing over the Emergency Broadcast System, is the doctor.

For it is the doctor who portrays, a la Jekyll and Hyde, an internal struggle between the innate good of the samaritan and the evil of one who can only think about himself. After several days of treating burn victims at the hospital and close to death himself, the doctor returns to his home in Kansas City to discover some squatters in the rubble which was once his house. He yells, "Get out of my house!", to which one of the squatters, an old man, responds by offering him a piece of fruit. It was the doctor's sense of property and lack of humanity which horrifies me, not because it represents a return to barbarism, but because it reveals the irrational and unjust way with which we treat each other already existing in our day.

Someone points out that the old man and doctor embrace in common humanity? What brotherhood is this? While some semblance of society survives, brotherhood does not. What a horrible world would exist even if we could survive such an exchange, for the fact is the world is doomed in the event of nuclear war.

What strikes me as even more horrible than The Day After was the discussion after The Day After. If the movie didn't scare you, the panel did. I won't waste print to review it all, but whenever Henry Kissinger starts talking about national security, I get scared. I got really scared by the way the constituency of the crew upheld the values of the status quo to the extent that El Wiesel accused the others of fighting a nuclear war around the table. Carl Sagan's points on arms reduction couldn't keep the conversation, rather the agenda from moving in the other direction. Why were there not any women, anti-nuclear activists, like Dr. Helen Caldicott or Randall Forsberg? A week later, and I'm still struck with the panelists unwitting futility, and yet their continuing pomposity in the face of a problem which may end with our extinction, however sober they were. It's terrifying to think that we can't do better than that! That these men, who seem so resigned to war, are those who must prevent it!

What effect the film, which was supposed to alter the course of history, is having a week later is still unknown. Many are simply already committed to their own view of peace. But many are shaken. If the film is to have any real political power, it had to reach home to whole lot of people who didn't really have an awareness of the problem and the effects of nuclear attack.

A week later, and the cruise missiles are being deployed in Europe...A week later and the Soviets have walked out of the arms talks in Geneva...A week later...or is it the day before?

Terrorism in the American tradition

In politics, as much as in our relations with other people, it is helpful, once in a while to sit back and question things, without taking anything for granted.

In the height of his illegal invasion of Grenada our navy bombed a mental hospital. This action resulted in the destruction of more than 25 doctors and patients.

Foad Vafaei

The Soviet Union has been portrayed to us by President Reagan as barbaric for having shot down a Korean airliner which had entered its territory illegally. We still don't know whether the Soviets knew they were dealing with a spy plane or a civilian one. (How could they? – when the pilot had refused to answer them).

The U.S. 82nd division command had all kinds of maps telling them where that mental hospital was, and yet they murdered 25 people. There is one difference: The Korean Airline tragedy happened inside the Soviet territory. The U.S., however, has committed a terrorist act on a foreign territory, which it invaded in violation of all international laws.

Some could play down the gravity of the bombing of a mental hospital by asserting that the incident happened during a war. But this argument has no moral foundations; can we then justify the criminal killing of civilian Jews by the Nazis in World War II on the ground that it was done during a war?!!

As a final defense, some could say: "but the Soviets are Communists; we are a democracy!" (as naive as the second assertion may sound.)

We would answer to these friends that this doesn't make any difference in the illegal and terrorist nature of Ronald Reagan's foreign policy, a foreign policy bent on aggression, war mongering, preparing for a nuclear holocaust, cowboy attitudes, use of crude force as the only means of reaching objectives — in short "law of jungle;" all reminiscent of the U.S.'s barbarities against the people of Vietnam (i.e. Napalm bombs, chemical warfare, mass destruction, etc...all resulting in the death of hundreds of thousands of civilians "to save them from Communism.")

Moreover, put into a global perspective, the invasion of Grenada, added to the aggressions committed by administration in Central America in support of murderous and sadistic regimes, along with a militaristic attitude toward the USSR (e.g. in Europe) which can only lead to a nuclear catastrophe, requires us not only to be concerned with these insanities but also actively oppose all nuclear build ups and foreign interventions.

Random Notes

On the future of the PLO

As the U.S. government continues to estimate their date for leaving Grenada, and the death toll for the bombings in Lebanon seems definite, more aggression occurs in Tripoli. Several months ago the PLO's many factions, once harmonious, began warring. Have the Israelies broken the strength of the PLO? Will they ever be able to continue their protected struggle to wipe out the Zionist entity of the Middle East as is stated in their Covenant (similar to our constitution)? What will become of the PLO?

Perhaps the question should be rephrased, "What will become of Lebanon after it is rid of Yasser Arafat?" The answer is clear, in that his removal, if it occurs, will end only one of the many threats to Lebanon's sovereignty. Perhaps the Islamic Jihad Organization, the group which took responsibility for three "kamakazi" type bombings and over 300 lives, can replace it. Jihad means "holy war" in most Arabic and Persian dialects, referring to a war in the name of Allah — the Moslem G-d. Similar to the PLO, they are a Syrian and Soviet supported organization, however, they are primarily loyal to the words of Ayatollah Khomeini of Iran. Perhaps some readers remember the attack on the American Embassy in Beirut by a parked truck loaded with explosives last April. The Islamic Jihad Organization took responsbility for that act as well. Terrorism is their only form of attack.

What will become of the PLO? It will be replaced if necessary. There are still many forces with a desire to perpetuate instead of solve the Palestinian refugee problem. Their ultimate goal is the destruction of the state of Israel as it is stated in the PLO charter. Lebanon has been under attack from various groups for more than eight years now. Isn't it about time we call on those responsible to retire?

One mistake is all it will take

The renewal of freedom and prosperity that Thanksgiving signifies was clouded on that day as we learned of the Soviet deployment of missiles.

While this action is a step in the wrong direction for world peace, our enemies can hardly be blamed for calling our bluff (we can only hope it's a bluff.) Remember, almighty America provoked this escalation in the arms race by deploying missiles in Europe earlier this month.

Tami Borton

President Reagan called this reaction "a sharp variance" in Russia's claimed desire to negotiate for peace. But this statement rings hypocrisy in view of the U.S. military actions following repeated reassurances that we want to negotiate.

One questions what Reagan and his boys expected as the repercussions of their threat. The Soviet walkout of peace talks in Geneva was not without notice, and not unavoidable had the U.S. agreed to backtrack in what seems like a race to push the button.

In a USSR broadcast following the news report last Thursday, it was said that the country's leaders could see no reason to continue efforts toward world peace and that deployments would only continue as to re-establish the balance of powers. The U.S. would have done the same if the shoe was on the other foot. My feeling is that our leaders will not let the Soviets' action go without upping the ante.

Just what are we fighting for anyhow? A missile could be deployed in every world citizen's back yard and the problem would probably not be solved, unless they were fired. Neither super power stands to lose any land, nor are they motivated to gain more through this cold war.

The silly poker game we are playing could just as easily be carried out with conventional warfare. Reagan's message that a few must die to preserve peace would, ironically, be a welcome solution right now.

Unfortunately, through a combination of media hype and network censoring, "The Day After's" vital message of the unimaginable results of nuclear war backfired. The naive and perhaps not-so-naive were told by the movie "sure it will be rough, but after a month or so in a fallout shelter we can carry on, who cares if we loss a little hair as long as we're alive."

The dismal truth would be a sub-freezing planet that, because of the 100-year-plus half-life of radioactive substances, might never be inhabitable again. In short, the end of all life, believed by many (myself not included) to be the only life in the universe, would result.

But what is happening today draws too close a parallel to the first hour of that movie; people going about their daily business, even planning for their future, when the destiny of the world is becoming increasingly unstable.

I, too, try not to think about this too much because it makes four years of studying and any future plans seem less important. But if something isn't done, the thought that this Christmas could be our last is not entirely unreasonable.

In our favor, if Ronnie wants to run again, a nuclear war will be avoided during the election year. But if he decides not to run, wins, or especially if he loses, we are still in danger under present foreign policies.

If any solution is to be met this year Reagan must meet with Soviet leader Yuri Andropov, if he's alive (I have my doubts.)

It is so very sad that we are sitting ducks until this happens, with nothing to do except pray to God (or whomever) that another John F. Kennedy comes out of the political woodwork in time to be elected in 1984, and that war is averted while Reagan finishes out his term.

The pages and pages and hours and hours of media devoted to remembering John F. Kennedy are particularly significant at this time.

The nationwide nostalgia for the youth and promise this man brought the country is frightening, after all, nostalgia got Ronald Reagan elected.

But in remembering Kennedy, America will be reminded of the Cuban missile crisis and the real danger we face. The U.S. responded to the Soviet placement of nuclear weapons in Cuba with the threat of nuclear war.

Although that disaster was avoided, Kennedy expressed concern over the larger problem of U.S./USSR security. Sooner or later somebody will make a mistake, he said, and someone will.

Gallery's drawings offensive

To the Editor,

During the past week I have been involved in a personal quandary which pitted my desire to understand and be open-minded against my sensibilities. This situation is the result of drawings of women currently being shown in the Hampden Gallery in Southwest. The exhibit depicts grotesque-looking women with distorted genitalia and hands. One woman has a gaping dog's mouth instead of a vagina. Another has two penises while yet another woman with a penis fellates herself.

I was instantly offended when I saw these prints but I assumed that they must not be oppressive or else they would not be so prominently displayed here at UMass. The more I thought of it the more I began to doubt their value and question their propriety. Now I realize that these sketches have no redeeming social value and in fact are oppressive to women as well as vulgar and base. I made the mistake that assuming that because these drawings were bold and radical that it was proper to display them. I also assumed that they had a purpose and served some good. I was wrong and it made me wonder if we have been lulled into a complacent attitude that only questions the conservatives and right wingers while accepting as good anything that can in some way be construed as left wing or liberal. I hope this is not the case as it can only stifle future progress. This exhibit came to us under the guise of meaningful expression that raises important questions and hopefully promotes social growth (The nature of these drawings allows no other explanation barring the blatant sexual harassment of women).

Yet they do not promote growth, they have no value and they have no place at an institute of higher learning. These drawings would be better set in the pages of Hustler comics or quickly scrawled on some dirty bathroom wall (The men's room in Goodell basement would be perfect) and composers of oppressive works should be referred to these places in the future. This exhibit should be removed immediately and in the future we should all be aware that there are problems to the left as well as to the right. Neither side of an issue is totally correct and we should question both sides as we attempt to end the abuses so prevalent in our society.

Stand for liberalism inflexible

To the Editor,

Rich Nangle's column lauding liberalism is one of the most outright displays of off-the-collar cry-baby tactics ever put into the Collegian. The amount of moralizing in his argument is so overbearing that his point is rendered almost irrational.

Although I don't consider myself diametrically opposed to Nangle's ardent liberalism, I find his assertion that the conservative movement on campus is comprised simply of "a new bunch of preppy frat boys" as particularly annoying. Aren't blind generalizations like this something that liberals seek to avoid?

Another point, Mr. Nangle automatically asserts that liberalism is "politically correct". (Gee, thanks for telling us the truth . . . now let's all become liberals.) There is a vast difference between offering a viewpoint and being totally inflexible and unrealistic: every issue has at least two sides.

Displaying liberal policies should be put into the hands of people who can generate a trenchant, intelligent argument — not one littered with gasps of anguish and home-made morality. I can see why one would not support the U.S. presence in Grenada and Lebanon, but don't even some liberals agree that our nation must be aware of its own best interest? Today, wars and conflicts are almost completely ideological, and ideologies worldwide are wholly inflexible — the question is where do we draw the line as to when too much sand is kicked in our faces?

My general point is that even Mr. Nangle's political opposition has a point. Juvenile depictions of "preppy frat boys" and unsubstantiated mockery of a campus backlash movement is foolish and does nothing to promote an apparently legitimate liberal movement in the practical sense.

Finally, Mr. Nangle associates conservatives with those who "cut their hair real short and harass anyone who doesn't". Well, I don't harass anyone, but my hair is short only because I think that long hair went out with polyester leisure suits. Now how is that for moralizing?!

Think before you act please!

To the Editor,

It's 12:45 a.m. Saturday night (though the events about to be described are commonplace any night of the week). I'm writing this letter while lying in bed, unable to sleep. Why? Because some guys are "playing guns" in the hallway, someone else is blasting a stereo, and some other inconsiderates are yelling down the hall. Ah, college life, where "kids" grow-up and become women and men-or at least that's what I thought was supposed to happen.

Instead, unfortunately, the great amount of freedom afforded in the dorms is severely abused, and signs of maturity are few and far between. I do not understand why the "boys" in the dorms act so aggressively (and yes, males do cause most of the problems). Do they think it is attractive behavior? Are they frustrated and/or lonely, in need of attention? Of course obnoxious display is not confined solely to the residence halls on this campus, but the uncaring disregard for others does seem to surface most conspicuously in the dorms.

Maybe for the present, students simply need to be reminded that the walls in the dorms are very thin, that noise penetrates them easily, and that just one stereo at a high volume can disturb a whole floor. But in the long-run, I am afraid that "reminders" an[1] pleas for common courtesy will be of no avail. At least not until people learn to cope with their emotions and tensions.

Invasion is a serious matter

To the Editor,

I would like to direct this letter to Mr. Karl Schieneman.

Mr. Schieneman, I believe that your letter of November 29 was a bogus display of ignorance and insensitivity.

Sarcasm is often funny but sometimes inappropriate. You chose an event of great controversy in the world today. Grenada is an especially important issue in the United States, and yet you feel that there is too much publicity about it. What do you suggest the press write about?

You also have the insensitivity to sterotype people. This practice of narrow-minded thinking, of insulting people, will not get you far in life, Mr. Schieneman.

People died during the invasion of Grenada. Children were killed, soldiers were killed, elderly people were killed. Understand that. It is, and was not funny.

You suggest, "So all I can say is let's sit back and enjoy the invasion while we can. Who knows when we'll be so fortunate again." If that's all you can say, fine. Please don't say anymore.

Herter display intriguing

By MELISSA K. GRAHAM
Collegian Correspondent

Lisa Hochstein's one week showing, entitled Discrete Moments, is both imaginatively conceived and impressively conveyed. Through her paintings, Hochstein evokes an intriguing protrayal of the way memory is overlapped by various associations of both time and place. Her collages are a brilliant recognition of the continuity in shapes and colors, as well as the strong relation of surface texture. Her complex textures and abstract forms all reveal the quality of consciousness beneath the work, thus generating a strong degree of intimacy with the work and the feeling that the artist is indeed sharing a strong part of herself with the viewer.

Although the paintings first strike one as being predominantly made up of greys and blacks, Hochstein adds striking touches of color which fill the work with a sense of richness. Since they are acrylics, the paintings consist of multiple layers slowly built on top of each other. These physically multiple layers correlate with the mulitple layers of images possible at different levels of consciousness. The painted images, as well as the color, work together to reveal the existence of these multiple levels of memory and consciousness. Hochstein, a UMass senior working toward her B.F.A., explained to me that the paintings "trigger all sorts of things — a sense of home and place, a sense of time, and a kind of allegory of the subconscious." She further revealed that many of the paintings contain "dream images" and are trying to come to terms with the way in which "memory overlaps associations."

In the Sun Room of the Gallery one finds the collages. These works display a brilliant use of texture as well as an exploring of the nature of layer and depth. The collages are of mixed media: cloth, paper, canvas, gauze, plaster, and thread are all layered to reveal complex surfaces. I later found out that this imagery was derived from looking at concrete walls under light, a fact which exemplifies Hochstein's belief that it "is important for people to take time to look in their own lives at the world."

This belief characterizes one of the wonderful aspects of this showing the true quality of intimacy between the artist and her world, and her creative urge to share this world with others. In looking at these works one must, as one viewer put it, "look, think, and feel it." And one does.

It's funny how the balance of nature works, especially in the movies. For example, in a B movie if someone dies, the next scene invariably shows the birth of a baby, cheap symbolism, but it works. Well, I guess the Happy Valley is actually a B movie, and a pretty bad one at that. Even as one club dies, another is born, actually reborn, reincarnation being a major plot twist in this work. The Hangar One bastion and butt of hundreds of jokes has officially closed. Alas, the walls that resounded to many of the areas best, along with many of the better upcoming national groups is no more. And yet, even as many of us shed a small tear, from out of the ashes rises . . . Rahars, the club that couldn't stay dead. When Rahars closed a couple years ago, a chapter of local history was completed. But apparently this epitaph was a bit premature, for this weekend will mark the club's reopening. Thank goodness for that. With grand opener Lynn Meryl, the club also reflects a growing trend in local clubs toward booking jazz and other musics which may not be considered entirely in vogue. Kudos to Rahars and best of luck.

At the clubs tonight the Rhythm Rockers at Sheehan's are your best bet for dancing. Tomorrow night there's Lynn Meryl at the new Rahars, or Heroes in Trouble at the Wok. Saturday night Preston Reed, a guitar virtuoso, will be at the Iron Horse Coffeehouse.

Sunday night Archie Shepp will be at the Iron Horse and Big Country will be at the Agora. Other concerts on the horizon include Jerry Garcia next Wednesday at Amherst College, James Cotton at the Bluewall next Friday, Dec. 7, and the Roches that same night at the Calvin.

Coming up next week: the great Christmas trivia contest and album giveaway. Get Psyched.

INTRAMURAL HIGHLIGHTS

Ball State the UMass Intramural Flag Football Champion, participated in the annual Northeast Regional Flag Football Championships, held at Worcester Polytechnical Institute, on the 25 November 1983. Twenty two teams entered from as far south as Matyland. Round one was played on Friday, 25 November, a beautiful, rainy, cold and snowy day. Ball State played and won three games: Westchester State, Northeastern, and Bradford. On Saturday, 26 November, colder but drier, UMass lost to Towson State in a single, sudden death overtime period. On Sunday, 27 November, Layfayette College defeated UMass in a double overtime period. Both defeats were in overtime placing UMass in 8th place. Al Mennino the Captain/Manager of Ball State and co-player Greg Bowman vote were unanimous selections to the All Region All Star Team. Three officials from UMass, J. Peimontese, J. Sciabarrasi and P. Dalton participated in the tournament. J. Sciabarrasi was selected as an All Region Official and will accompany the winning teams to the Sugar Bowl Championships, held at New Orleans, New Years Day. The winning team was Towson State, and the runner-up was Livingstone College.

Basketball entries are still being accpeted. Tentative cutoff date for entries is the 11 December. Basketball managers meetings are scheduled for the 13/14 December, 6 pm, Room 251 Boyden Building. An officials clinic will follow at 7 pm. Managers or a team representative must attend at least one meeting.

Volleyball Playoffs begin Monday, 5 December. Drawing for playoff positions will be held in Room 223, Boyden Building, Thursday 1 December at 6 pm. Schedules will be available at the meeting or Friday AM in the Intramural Office.

O'Reilly's son may need transplant

BOSTON (AP) — Four-month-old Evan O'Reilly, son of Boston Bruins captain Terry O'Reilly, has a serious liver disorder that eventually could require a liver transplant, the National Hockey League star said Wednesday.

O'Reilly said he and his wife, Lourdes, have begun a waiting game, closely watching Evan's progress.

Flanked by several of his teammates, O'Reilly and Evan's doctors held a press conference at the New England Medical Center's Floating Hospital to explain the baby's condition.

teams, who are currently one, two in the Patrick division.

Everybody knows that Al Arbour and the Islanders are in their Drive for Five but everybody's sentimental hope has to be the Rangers, except for Bruins fans. The Rangers and the Islanders were tied for first last night.

Herb Brooks has the talent, the fighters, and Rangers fans hope the smarts to end the Rangers 40 plus drought win the Cup. Pierre LaRouche is the top scorer for the Rangers. Mike Rodgers is another top gun.

Edmonton and Gretzky (74 points, leading his nearest rival by 23 points) are cleaning house in the weak Smythe Division. So what else is new? Who needs defense out there?

The Norris Division has turned into one of mediocrity. The North Stars have 25 points and Detroit, Toronto, and Chicago are all tied for second with 22. Since when have Detroit and Toronto been in second place?

The Red Wings are playing exciting hockey in the Motor City and they drew the biggest NHL crowd in history (21,000 plus) to see them play Pittsburgh of all teams. Hmmmm.

Oh yes, the Bruins. True, Boston is leading the toughest division in the league even with a rash of injuries. But Buffalo and Quebec are close behind. Quebec should fade, though.

So this season looks to be an interesting one to be sure. Hockey should be an interesting break from all that ESPN basketball this January.

Swimmers lose to Springfield for third loss

By TOM SCOLLINS
Collegian Correspondent

It was a tough night for the University of Massachusetts women's swimming and diving team. They were outdone by a strong Springfield College team 87-53 and dropped their third straight meet. UMass is now 1-3. Springfield finished third in New England's last year.

UMass was not without it's bright spots though. Co-captain Liz Feinberg was a double winner taking the 50 yard freestyle and an exciting 200 yard freestyle. Liz qualified for the New England's with her time in the 50.

Trying to duplicate last meet's triple was not to be however. A new experimental NCAA rule states that after one false start, the swimmer will be disqualified. This rule only holds for dual meets and the regular format of allowing one bad start will be followed for championships.

Coach Valerie Turtle is still optimistic on the future of the team. "We had some drops in time and personal bests again, Nancy Stephens took almost two full seconds off her previous best in the 100 yard butterfly."

The most exciting match of the night belonged to freshman Allison Uzzo. She won a close 500 yard freestyle that had the whole crowd on their feet. Coach Turtle was especially pleased with the 200 yard freestyle relay team (Sue Freitas, Nancy Stephens, Jennifer Lowe, and Lori McCluskey) who had their fastest time of the year in that event last night. "Even in meets when you don't come out with a victory, you can still have victories in other areas," observed Turtle.

Rosemary Kelsall was strong for the swimmers last night finishing second in the 200 yard breaststroke and placing third in the 100 yard breaststroke by three-hundreds of a second. In addition, her times in both events qualified her for the New England's. Allison Uzzo was another who qualified in an event with her time in the 200 yard freestyle.

"I'm pleased where we are now," said Coach Turtle, "they're swimming strongly and there is still a lot of excitement within the team."

Nancy Connolly, swimming in the 200 fly in an earlier meet, couldn't help the UMass women's team as they dropped a 83-57 meet to Springfield last night in Boyden.

"Even in meets when you don't come out with a victory, you can still have victories in other areas," observed Coach Turtle.

Coach Turtle and her squad will have a lot of time to prepare for their next match which isn't until December 11. The swimmers and divers will have their hands fulls there as they take on the Black Bears of the University of Maine. UMaine has been a perennial powerhouse in the New England area placing second last year. UMass and UMaine have not competed in a dual meet in over four years. "There will definitely be some good swimming at that meet," commented Turtle, "UMaine is a tough team and it's a match where we have nothing to lose and everything to gain."

The match will be in Boyden and start at 1. If you've never seen a swim meet before this will be a good opportunity to watch the UMass women and it promises to be a highly competitive match against a high caliber opponent. So take a break from your final studies and come to Boyden and catch some exciting women's swimming.

Young UMass wrestlers pinned down by Hofstra

By JOHN BADGER
and GERRY deSIMAS
Collegian Staff

Wrestling is a sport where the individual meets his opponent alone. It's one on one and the rest of the team can only yell encouragement.

Even so, when one team starts to roll it does affect the other. Such was the case Tuesday night in the Boyden Auxiliary gym as 29th ranked Hofstra University sent the University of Massachusetts wrestling team reeling to it's second straight loss by a 42-10 margin.

This time, Massachusetts took the early lead as Richard Gardinaer picked up six points as Hofstra forfeited the 118 pound class. The Dutchmen came right back and narrowed the lead to 6-4 as the Flying Dutchmen's Gary Pesky took a tough 17-8 decision from freshman Chris Lee at 126.

UMass lost the lead for good as freshman Mike Hanlon was pinned with just four seconds left in the match, at 6:56 by a more experienced Chris Amella. The matches are seven minutes long, three, two, two. Hanlon fought hard but Hofstra built it's lead to 10-6.

After Philippe Durant (142 lbs) was pinned by Hofstra's Herbie Valentine to give the Dutchmen a 16-6 margin, UMass' Dave MacDonald was decisioned by Ted DiPasqualle by a 21-5 score. MacDonald was elusive with several escapes. Hofstra now led 21-6 and the rout was on.

After another Hofstra pin at 158 lbs of Wesley Beckwith (normally a 145), and the lead was now an insurmountable 27-6, senior captain Scott McQuaide gave the Minuteman fans something to cheer about.

The senior dominated Ken Dick for the entire match before coming on strong in the third period to clinch the match. McQuaide had Dick on his back but time ran out before he could get the pin. His decision left the score at 27-10.

Hofstra took the rest of the matches to build up their 42-10 advantage. Francisco Guitierrez was pinned at 177 lbs. At 190, Brian Shaughnessy, wrestling up a class, did a good job on his Hofstra opponent, controlling most of the match. But he made an error which Hofstra capitalized on and the Dutchmen went on to take the match.

At heavy weight, UMass had no one to offer, and forfeited.

"We haven't been producing," said Mike Hanlon. "We have a good team. We just haven't been getting the breaks."

One factor in the loss could be the inexperience of the Minutemen to college wrestling. UMass started seven freshmen in their ten man lineup. McQuaide (a senior) and Gutierrez (junior) were the only upperclassmen in the lineup.

The team, naturally, does not want to use this as an excuse but it is a factor.

"I can't speak for the rest of the team," said Hanlon, "but I have to get used to college wrestling. It's a lot faster and they (opponents) are very strong."

Another thing that hurt UMass was the re-shuffling of men to fill the weight classes because some were overweight. Durant, went at 142 because regular William Pearsall was over. Hanlon was a second string 126, now he's a starting 134. It's a definite disadvantage to wrestle out-of your class as Shaughnessy found out. The freshman was 15 pounds lighter than his opponent and when he made a mistake his opponent just, literally, sat on him.

The Minutemen hope to get on the winning track this weekend as they travel to the Coast Guard Invitational Tournament this weekend.

Speaking of... fast bicycling and some suprising hockey

By GERRY deSIMAS
Collegian Staff

Speaking of sports that do not have varsity teams here at UMass, hockey and bicycling come to mind.

Hockey, the most popular sport in Massachusetts some claim, is something that deserves mention. But bicycling?

Yesterday in the Collegian, there was a story about the UMass bicycle club and their attempt to bring back intercollegiate bike racing to the Amherst campus. It sounds like a good idea.

They should not have any trouble finding riders or a place to practice on this campus. Don't you see those bicyclists weaving through the ticked-off, paranoid pedestrians between classes coming inches from knocking them into the ground and crashing into themselves.

They would be a natural for bicycle racing, which requires close manuevering and close drafting of riders in races. Weaving through the pedestrians is a challenging thing to especially at twenty M.P.H. down the hill by Southwest. What practice for the team.

On a more serious note, let's leave the pedestrians alone and look at the surprises in the National Hockey League.

One of the biggest has to be the demise of the Montreal Canadiens to the status of also-rans. The once-proud Canadiens are only at .500 (11-11-1) and only three points ahead of the Whalers. It looks like the Habs will be canned after the first round of the playoffs again this year, if they make them at all.

The Washington Capitals are a poor start, have come to be respectable. They trail the Flyers and the two New York

Collegian NFL Picks

It's now the 14th week of the NFL season and there is now only three weeks to go. Last week, amazingly, all the home teams were winners. Amazingly, the incredible Scott Hood picked all but three of the winning teams. The Hood had the best record of the year last week with a 11-3. That enabled him to tie the master Bill Shea for the overall lead. Shea went 8-6 last week.

Awesome Tony Betros came in with a close second to Hood with a 10-4 mark. Hard-luck Gerry deSimas pulled out a 8-6 stance while the argumentive Kevin Deluca held up the bottom with an even 7-7.

Minnesota at Detroit looks like a good Monday Nighter this week.

Faculty Senate questions priority of UM sports rink

By LAURA YEE
Collegian Staff

A motion by the Faculty Senate to oppose the proposed construction of a multi-purpose sports facility at the University of Massachusetts was substituted at yesterday's meeting by a new motion to include discussions with the Campus Physical Plant Committee and the Athletic Council before taking a stand on the issue.

A $600 million state capital outlay budget now in the Massachusetts Senate appropriates $3 million for planning and preliminary construction of a multi-sports facility at UMass, the heart of which will be an ice hockey rink.

Faculty Senate Secretary Robert E. Jones said the state plan has met with varying opposition from faculty and administration members, because, "the ice hockey rink was not on anyone's priority list, and all of a sudden, $3 million is appropriated for its construction."

"I am not opposed to the ice hockey rink," Jones said. "The issue is one of priorities. For so many other critical needs, to spend $3 million seems to many people an inappropriate use of funds."

The faculty senate feels that the equivalent sum be used for repairs of deteriorating classrooms, buildings, lecture halls and for replacement of obsolete and non-functioning equipment used for classroom and laboratory instruction." he said.

"I personally don't see (the sports facility) as a high priority," UMass President David C. Knapp said during his senate address.

Knapp said he is not opposed to the building of a sports facility since "other

Crampton and Cashin fires may be interconnected

By ANNE McCRORY
and MARY ANNE BEEN
Collegian Staff

An official investigating the more than 30 acts of arson at the University of Massachusetts this semester have determined fires in different dormitories are related.

Rosemary Tarantino of the Hampshire County District Attorney's Office said Wednesday that "some" of the eight suspicious fires in Cashin dormitory in the Sylvan Residential Area "are related to" the 16 fires in Crampton dormitory in the Southwest Residential Area.

Tarantino further said investigators "don't believe there is any kind of conspiracy" among residents in setting the fires, and noted messages found prior to at least one Crampton fire are being considered as evidence.

Chancellor Joseph P. Duffey said Wednesday there are "still some things we are not prepared to announce" in terms of the investigation being conducted by both University and state officials.

Duffey would not comment on the effect the fires, publicized by local, state and even national media, have had on the image of UMass.

"My first concern is not the image, but the safety of the students," he said, noting he has spoken with Gov. Michael S. Dukakis on the investigation.

UMass President David C. Knapp, on campus to address the Faculty Senate Thursday, said he is "convinced the campus is doing everything it conceivably can to cope with the situation."

Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Dennis Madson, addressed the senate and noted the Dean of Students Office is open to aid Crampton residents with academic and other problems. Madson requested that faculty consider delaying exams and assignment deadlines for Crampton students. Fifteen residents have moved out of the dorm so far with three more scheduled to leave today, he said.

According to Thea Costine, assistant housing assignment coordinator, six of the former Crampton residents have found permanent rooms, and nine are now living in swing spaces. Ten of the 15 former residents have moved out of Southwest, she said.

Director of Housing Services Joseph A. Zannini met Thursday with Donna Murphy, author of a petition signed by 131 residents requesting a full refund of the $606 housing fee.

"He didn't want to say 'yes' and he didn't want to say 'no'," said Murphy, who will speak before her housemates at a private meeting on Monday.

Zannini said the refund could take up to two weeks, Murphy said.

While no reported fires disrupted Southwest residents Thursday, a dormitory across campus was hit with suspected arson.

A smoldering toilet paper fire in an elevator in Brown dormitory, a Sylvan residence next to Cashin, was reported just after midnight Thursday, according to Environmental Health and Safety Director Donald Robinson. The 12:10 a.m. fire was Proposed outlay budget gives UMass $16 million

By ANNE McCRORY
Collegian Staff

The proposed state capital outlay budget which would allocate more than $16 million to the University of Massachusetts for extensive building repairs and projects would preserve the school's priorities, UMass President David C. Knapp said Thursday.

The proposed budget includes $5 million for deferred maintenance projects, such as the renovation of Goessman Laboratory and Fine Arts Center roof repairs, and $6 million for utilities to repair and improve the high-pressure steam pipes which heat the Southwest Residential Area. Another $3 million has been proposed for the study, planning and construction of a multi-sports facility, including an ice rink.

Knapp, speaking before the Faculty Senate, said the budget would "help us to begin dealing with some of the maintenance problems" on campus. Office maintenance costs were cited as one area in need of support, which Knapp attributed to "significantly increasing" utility costs and personnel items. "But I think it's a general problem," he said.

"Those who support excellence in public colleges and universities expect a clear fit between academic and institutional plans and operating and capital budgets," Knapp said. "They want us to be clear about our priorities, and they expect us to make hard choices."

The Southwest steamline is now 18-years-old with a life expectancy of 20 years, according to Physical Plant officials. Funds would pay for estimated construction costs and an emergency repair fund in the event the system failed. The budget would also fund renovations in Marshall Hall and Goessman laboratory, the site of future asbestos removal. A laboratory animal facility and additional pedestrian lighting area is also funded in the proposed budget.

H.J. Littlefield, director of facilities planning for the University, said following a Wednesday night meeting with legislature committee members he felt "they were comfortable" with the budget recommendations.

"Bear in mind that they were going over the entire capital outlay budget in three hours," he said, "they didn't have time to ask questions on specific items."

The budget, the state's first since 1980, was passed in the Massachusetts House of Representatives two weeks ago and will hopefully go before the Senate next week, Kathleen Marrigan, aide to Sen. John Olver, D-Amherst, said Thursday. It is now before the Senate Ways and Means Committee.

"Public higher education once again has value in the Commonwealth, but support is by no means automatic," Knapp said. "Fiscally we will, in fiscal year 1985, be in fierce competition for what are likely to be limited increases in revenue."

Agencies to submit own reports

WASHINGTON (AP) — Five private agencies promised Thursday to prepare their own report on human rights abuses in El Salvador, after President Reagan vetoed a bill that would have required Salvadoran political and social reforms as a condition of U.S. military aid.

At the same time, leading Democrats denounced Reagan's veto as likely to encourage right-wing death squads in El Salvador which recently have intensified killing of civilians regarded as politically suspect. The Democrats said they would resubmit the vetoed bill when Congress reconvenes Jan. 23.

The bill would have revived a two-year-old law that required Reagan to cut off military aid to the rightist Salvadoran government if he could not certify every six months that it was making progress on human rights and political and economic reforms. The next report would have been due Jan. 16.

Meanwhile, five anti-Sandinista groups told the United States they are prepared to end military operations against Nicaragua if that nation takes "credible steps" toward democracy, a senior American official said Thursday. The official, reporting on talks Thursday in Panama City between the anti-Sandinista leaders and Richard Stone, Reagan's special Central American envoy, said his report was intended to convey a message directly to Sandinista leaders in Managua.

Rebels may agree to stop fighting

Three Nicaraguan guerrilla groups told U.S. envoy Richard Stone yesterday they are willing to stop fighting if the leftist government takes specific steps toward democracy, a senior American official in Washington said.

Stone met with guerrilla leaders in Panama City in an effort to get the rebel groups to work together, according to a senior official in Washington who spoke on the condition that he was not identified.

The Washington official said "the anti-Sandinista groups are prepared to open negotiations with the Sandinista government" and "suspend paramilitary activity in Nicaragua if the Sandinista government takes specific, credible steps to implement the democratic promises they made to the OAS in 1979."

Large defense rise planned for '85

WASHINGTON (AP) — Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger is planning a Pentagon spending request for the next fiscal year of about $305 billion, an increase of nearly $55 billion or more than 21 percent over this year's level, congressional sources disclosed Thursday.

Several sources predicted a request that large would provoke a major election year fight in Congress, which fought a pitched battle with President Reagan over defense spending earlier this year before voting less money than he wanted.

A request that large also would become a certain issue in next year's presidential election campaign, should Reagan choose to seek a second term. All eight Democratic hopefuls favor cuts in the administration's buildup, although they differ widely on specifics.

It was not known whether Weinberger has forwarded the Pentagon's request for fiscal 1985 to the White House for Reagan's review. But one source said the spending blueprint "hasn't been thrashed out in front of the president yet." Reagan will ultimately decide how large a defense budget request to submit to Congress.

Congressional sources said Weinberger went over his proposal at a private breakfast meeting Wednesday with five key GOP leaders in the Senate, including Republican Leader Howard Baker of Tennessee.

One aide said Weinberger left at least some senators "pretty much stunned, pretty adamant they won't get a number that big."

"It's going to be a real donnybrook if they insist on asking for that large a number," this aide added.

Columbia to be visible this weekend

BOSTON (AP) — If weather conditions are right it should only take the naked eye and some imagination for New Englanders to spot the space shuttle Columbia at certain times through the weekend, said a space agency spokesman Thursday.

On its ninth trip into space, the Columbia will look to its observers like a star in the sky, said Lu Sudak of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA).

Viewers in Massachusetts and Rhode Island should look to the sky at 4:43 p.m. Friday, 4:32 p.m. Saturday and 4:22 p.m. Sunday. In New Hampshire, the times are the same on Friday and Saturday but starts one minute earlier at 4:21 p.m. on Sunday.

Maine observers should have their eyes on the sky at 4:42 p.m. Friday, 4:32 p.m. Saturday, 4:22 p.m. Sunday and 4:11 p.m. Monday. In Connecticut, the shuttle will be visible at 4:43 p.m. Friday and 4:32 p.m. Saturday only, Sudak said.

The shuttle is scheduled to land at Edwards Air Force Base in California at 11:11 a.m. Dec. 8.

Jury finds Lavelle guilty of lying

WASHINGTON (AP) — Rita Lavelle, former head of the government's $1.6 billion hazardous waste cleanup program, was convicted Thursday on three felony counts of perjury and one count of trying to obstruct a congressional inquiry.

After deliberating almost seven hours, the jury found Ms. Lavelle guilty of lying last February about the date she learned her former employer, Aero-Jet General Corp., was involved in a California waste dump.

The jury convicted her on two counts of lying before Senate and House committees about this fact and on one count of lying about the date in a sworn statement submitted to Congress.

Ms. Lavelle also was convicted of trying to obstruct a congressional inquiry by sending the false statement to Congress.

The only count for which the jury did not return a guilty verdict was a charge that Ms. Lavelle lied last February when she denied using her post at the Environmental Protection Agency to help Republican candidates.

However, on four of the five felony counts brought against Ms. Lavelle by a grand jury in August, the 10 women and two men on the jury found her guilty.

Former senator convicted of extortion

Boston (AP)-Barring possible further appeals, former Sen. James A. Kelly Jr. faces a prison term for allegedly extorting $34,500 from the defunct Masello & Associates Architects Inc. of Worcester.

The 1st U.S. Court of Appeals has rejected all objections to Kelly's conviction. These include claims of prejudicial pre-trial publicity and a failure of the trial court to investigate allegations of possible juror misconduct.

Mark E. Robinson, assistant U.S. attorney, said Thursday this means Kelly "will begin serving his sentence." However, he said he did not know exactly when he would have to report or if there might be further appeals.

John S. Leonard, Kelly's lawyer, was involved in another trial and was unavailalbe for comment.

Murder conviction thrown out

BOSTON (AP) — The state Supreme Court threw out a murder conviction Thursday against a defendant charged in the stabbing death of a man near the Boston Common.

The justices ruled that William M. Dorsey should not have been convicted of second degree murder in the 1981 death of Michael T. Lumenti. However, they allowed a guilty finding on assault and battery charges to stand.

The attack took place Sept. 20, 1981 [illegible] Court in the decision said.

following an incident at the Park Street mass transit station on the edge of the [illegible] Dorsey and co-defendant [illegible] F. Hennessey were standing at a bank of public telephones when a dog urinated on Hennessey. After several spectators laughed, Hennessey kicked at the dog and chased it, the decision said.

When the dog returned later, Hennessey stabbed it with a knife he slid from his coat sleeve.

Speak out on dorm violence to bring women together

By RITA MURPHY
Collegian Staff

She is sitting in her dormitory room with the man who has been in her class all semester. They are talking, laughing, becoming friends.

It is getting late and she asks him to leave. He refuses.

She doesn't know what she can do. She is about to become a victim of a violent crime.

She is not alone.

Violence against women in the dorms is not an uncommon occurance at the University of Massachusetts. It effects many women in the residence hall system, so much so that the East Side Residential Education Sexism Awareness Program, together with women's groups on campus, have organized a speak out set for Monday night from 7 to 10 p.m. in Skinner Hall Auditorium.

The speak out will give women on campus the opportunity to come together to discuss the problem of violence against women in the dorms, said Angela M. Giudice, one of the coordinators of the event.

"People don't report crimes against women on campus so it's hard to put the problem into statistics, but it is a problem, a major problem on this and on other campuses," Guidice said.

The speak out is to bring women on campus together to let each know violence does exist, and something can be done about it, she said.

Violence against women on campus can take many forms. The most drastic of which is rape. But, there are other forms of violence which affect women, beatings by boyfriends, the trauma of incest, verbal abuse, to name a few.

There is no sure fire way of preventing violence against women, but there are things women can do.

Susan Kirshner, a counselor advocate at the Everywomen's Center, said one of the most important things for women to do is to talk about the problem of violence against women.

"A major problem for women victims is the feeling of isolation and shame. They need to talk with others, by doing so, they'll see they're not alone," Kirshner said.

Giudice said the speak out's success or failure will be judged on whether or not women can leave the event with the knowledge they are not alone in fearing violence against women.

"If women can walk out of there and feel unified in the struggle against combating it (violence), then I'll be satisfied," Giudice said.

While Giudice said she hopes the speak out will help women deal with violence, the event is only one step to helping the campus better deal with crimes against women.

"The event must be put into historical perspective. Women have been working over the last 10 years on ways to deal with the problem. With a transcient population it has been difficult," she said.

Baldwin will address student leader conference

By JIM FINKLE
Collegian Staff

Novelist James Baldwin, University of Massachusetts Chancellor Joseph Duffey, and a representative of the Embassy of the Republic of Cape Verde will speak Saturday at a Third World student conference held here.

Duffey will make welcoming remarks to more than 300 student leaders who are expected to attend "The Fifth Annual New England Student Leadership Conference," according to Director of the UMass Office of Third World Affairs Sherwood Thompson. Registration for the conference, which is free and open to the public, will begin at 8:30 a.m. in the Campus Center Auditorium.

Baldwin, a visiting professor in the Five College Area, will make the keynote address at 10 a.m. on "how blacks and Third World students can best impact higher education in the 1980s," Thompson said.

"He (Baldwin) is a noted activist who has worked in the student movement for many years," Thompson said. "He is timely because of his empathy with student movements and his experience in the civil rights movement."

Raymond Almeida, public information officer for the Embassy of the Republic of Cape Verde, will speak to members of the Cape Verdean American Student Caucus on "leadership issues and how to impact student life on campus," according to John Lopes, career component coordinator for the Collegiate Committee for the Education of Blacks and Other Minority Students (CCEBMS).

Thompson said the goal of the conference is to discuss, improve and coordinate student leadership in the New England Third World Community. "It's a solidarity conference," he said.

"We hope to establish a networking system among participants," Thompson said. "Our goal is to highlight our commonality, to highlight our special interests."

After a 12:30 p.m. luncheon at the Blue Wall with James Baldwin, participants may attend a variety of workshops. "Third World Students and the Media," "Racism and Stress Management," and "Problems/Challenges facing Third World Artists" are topics of some discussions. University of Massachusetts Afro-American Studies Professor William Strickland will lead a workshop on "The Significance of Jesse Jackson's Presidential Campaign" at 1:45 p.m.

The conference will conclude with the formal approval of the constitution and bylaws of the New England Third World Student Alliance at 4:45 p.m.

Man charged with assault

Amherst Police arrested a 17-year-old University of Massachusetts student Thursday morning after he allegedly threw a beer mug through the front windshield of a police cruiser.

Eden F. Pomeroy, a Leach dormitory resident from Gloucester, was arrested at 1:40 a.m. Thursday and charged with throwing a projectile at a moving car, malicious destruction, and assault and battery with a dangerous weapon.

Police said a cruiser was traveling south on North Pleasant Street, en route to the scene of a brawl on Pray Street, when a mug was thrown through the car's windshield. The officer got out of the car near the Fine Arts Center and chased the assailant on foot. He then tackled the suspect near the Morrill Science Center, which sent both men flying through the window of a neighboring greenhouse.

The officer had minor cuts on his forearm, and Pomeroy sustained a small laceration on his head, police said. An ambulance took Pomeroy to Cooley-Dickinson Hospital, where he was treated then brought to the Amherst police station.

The fight to which the officer was responding occurred in front of the Pub Wednesday night, and involved five men. Police said two men allegedly jumped three others, and a brawl ensued. The officers at the scene had to separate the men, and the two who allegedly started the fight fled. Police arrested one 21-year-old man, and charged him with being a disorderly person.

Police said the assault on the cruiser was in no way connected with the brawl.

Pomeroy was arraigned Thursday morning in Hampshire District Court. His case was continued to Dec. 28 for a pre-trial conference.

Activists to speak against FBI

By CAMDEN PIERCE

Two members of Puerto Rican independence movements, who face prison sentences for criminal contempt for refusing to testify before a grand jury after being subpoenaed by the FBI, are to speak Saturday at the University of Massachusetts.

Julio Rosado, a leader in the National Liberation Movement Puerto Rico, and Shelly Miller, a member of the New Movement in Solidarity with Puerto Rican Independence and Socialism, are being sponsored by Loose Lips Sink Ships, a local coalition of progressive groups.

"It's in response to recent FBI activity in the Northampton, Amherst area," said Angela Keefe, a member of the coalition. Gays and lesbians in Northampton have been harassed by FBI agents, she said.

Keefe said the cases of Rosado and Miller represent the first time the criminal contempt charge has been used against political activists, and may portend a new wave of repression by the FBI in the United States. Rosado has been sentenced to three years in prison after refusing to testify before a New York Federal Grand Jury formed to investigate bombings in New York City last New Year's Day. He is free pending appeal of his conviction.

Rosado and Miller are to speak at the 6th floor lounge in Thompson Hall, at 2 p.m. Marta Rodriguez will provide entertainment.

Wilkinson resigns as dean

"I have been here eight years and during that period of time I've run out of creative ideas. I want to give somebody new a look at it."

The dean of the department of social and behavioral sciences at the University of Massachusetts has announced his resignation, citing a desire to return to research at the University.

T.O. Wilkinson has worked as dean of the social and behavioral sciences department for eight years, and has also worked as coordinating dean of the Bachelor's Degree in Individual Concentration (BDIC) at UMass and as representative to the Five-College Curriculum.

T.O. Wilkinson, dean of the Faculty of Social and Behavioral Sciences.

"I have been here eight years and during that period of time I've run out of creative ideas," Wilkinson said. "I want to give somebody new a hack at it."

Bonnie Strickland, special assistant to the chancellor, praised Wilkinson's work during his term as dean.

"I'm sorry to see him go," Strickland said. "He is a splendid dean and has given much to this University."

Strickland said that as dean, Wilkinson works on all personnel policies in his department including hiring, evaluating, and granting tenure to department professors. Wilkinson is also involved in creating the College of Arts and Sciences budget, and works with department heads on curricular and instructional matters.

"He has been helpful in attracting women faculty and minority faculty and supporting them once they get here," Strickland said.

Wilkinson announced his resignation two weeks ago, but he will remain as dean until August, he said. He then plans to return to faculty duty at UMass.

"I hope to be able to get a sabbatical grant to get back into the research area," Wilkinson said. He said he has studied demography of Japanese population in the past, and would like to return to that field.

Orchard Hill dormitory roof repairs prove faulty

By REBECCA THATCHER
Collegian Staff

The controversial repair of the roofs in Field and Grayson dormitories in Orchard Hill took a turn for the worse Wednesday when a testing process, which entailed flooding the roof, caused leakage to the seventh and sixth floors of Field and short-circuited the fire alarm system after causing two false alarms.

"They flooded the new roof in order to see if it worked," said a firefighter who was on patrol. "It doesn't work," he added.

But Don Pelkey, assistant operations manager in Orchard Hill and Central, said the work on the new roof involved a state-of-the-art method for repairing flat roofs that requires careful application and sealing of large pieces of single-ply rubber.

"This is the ultimate in roof construction," Pelkey said.

Water entered the pipe chase which contains the fire alarm system and other utilities, when they flooded the roof, Pelkey said.

Michael Lucy a facilities engineer, said they had not yet figured out what had caused the leak into the pipe chase.

"We think it might be a crack in a drain, but we don't know for sure," Lucy said.

Some Field residents are angry with the way the roof repair program has been going.

"This whole roof-fixing affair has been handled with little respect for the students," said Steve Shore, a music and accounting major.

Harold Salant, a resident who has headed an effort to get compensation for the students living on the seventh floor, said his petition had been denied by Housing Services despite "violations of the Field House rules on the part of the University."

"We have been affected by the noisy roof construction. For three weeks the noise in the rooms made a machine shop sound like a church. it was like the sound of a dentist drill multiplied by ten thousand," said the irate resident.

"We signed up for the academic corridor because we expected to be able to study in our rooms, thanks to the universtiy, we were not able to study in our rooms for fifteen school days," he said.

Pelkey said the subject was still under discussion, and administrators and students are planning to meet at the next Field house Council meeting.

BOG questions SGA facts

By RALPH ROBERTS
Collegian Staff

Members of the Student Government Association (SGA) of the University of Massachusetts have released "most questionable" information to the public by not checking their facts with the Campus Center Board of Governors, BOG chair Mike Reilly said last evening at the board meeting.

Reilly and other members of the BOG raised the issue after an article appeared in the Collegian yesterday regarding the Student Senate's concern of the health of University Store employees, as asbestos is soon to be removed form the store.

While Reilly listed four statements within the article that were "doubtful, if not erroneous," he traced the unjustice back to Cindy Lehmbeck, rents and fees committee chair, and also partly to the Collegian.

"While we usually maintain effective communication with the SGA, Lehmbeck and other members of the SGA should bother to check their information with the BOG office. They'd find out much more reliable information," Reilly said.

The article states that the store employees are worried about their health.

"After talking with Win Cummings(manager of the University Store), he assured me that no employees are worried about their health as the asbestos at its present state won't cause any illness," Reilly said.

The article mentions the loss of study space in reference to which Reilly said "that is just ridiculous. We now have more study space than before, because we've opened up many meeting rooms in the Campus Center and also the Coffee Shop for studying."

Auto accidents reported

By GREG BROWN
Collegian Staff

An accident on Route 116 and Meadow Street sent a 1970 Dodge van skidding 116 feet on its driver's side, after the van's drive shaft broke off, lodged itself into the pavement, and catapulted the van into the air.

The driver, Wallace E. Wenzel, 48, of Springfield, reportedly sustained only minor injuries in the accident, which occured at about 10 a.m. Wednesday. Police said the van's gas tank also ruptured in the accident, and that the van was "demolished."

In another accident Wednesday, a car reported stolen from Holyoke struck an embankment and was totalled, police said.

A silver Oldsmobile was reportedly travelling at "a very high speed," police said, when it struck a West Street embankment. The driver, identified only as a young black man, fled the scene on foot, police said.

Larcenies plagued Amherst apartment complexes Tuesday and Wednesday.

A Puffton Village resident reported at 12:30 p.m. the larceny from a car of a stereo equalizer and a power booster, the total value of which was reported to be $145.

A jar with about $200 was reported missing from an apartment in Brandywine at 7:55 p.m. Wednesday. Police said the apartment was broken into, but nothing else was taken.

A car parked in the Brittany Manor complex was broken into some time Tuesday night, police said, and taken were a bookbag, a checkbook and a calculator. No value was given.

Three cars parked outside the Southwood Apartment complex were broken into Wednesday, police said. An AM-FM stereo radio was taken from a white Fiat there, valued at $100.

discovered by a student who stopped the elevator on the sixth floor and notified the floor's resident assistant, who called the police, he said.

The building alarm was not pulled and the building not evacuated because "there was no smoke condition -- the fire had self-extinguished," Robinson said. There were no injuries or damage.

"It depends on the situation whether to pull the alarm or not," he said. "We have to be careful with the more frequent alarms -- they could be false. We don't want the students to become apathetic. Our policy now is that if anyone has any doubt, don't hesitate to pull the alarm."

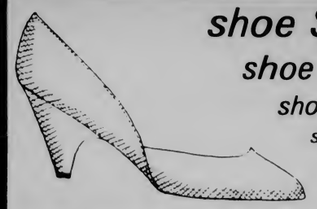
Bermuda College Weeks
March 3 to 31 and April 14 to 21

One of our previous college visitors described this event as "a week of wretched excess." An exaggeration perhaps, but not altogether inaccurate.

Your week begins with a Sunday night Get Acquainted bash at one of our hotels, clubs or discos—meeting old friends, making new ones. The next morning, the tough part begins.

Spending day after sun drenched day on soft, pink beaches. Swimming, tanning, body-gazing. Imbibing our special libations. Enjoying free beach buffet lunches, free calypso and steel band waterside concerts, even a free cruise—all courtesy of the Bermuda Department of Tourism.



What will you do with your free time? What won't you do! Bermuda is famed for its snorkeling and sailing, tennis and golf. For its fine restaurants, discos and British pubs. And for its fabulous mopeds—everybody's favourite way to tour the island.

Think you can handle a week of this? Talk to your campus friends, and see your Campus Travel Representative or your Travel Agent for complete details.

For more information, including a Bermuda College Weeks brochure, contact your Campus Travel Representative or your Travel Agent.

Couldn't you use a little Bermuda this spring?

institutions have been commended as first class for their hockey."The University is in great need of student support in sports Knapp said, and he believes the sports facility would generate that support.

Environmental Sciences Prof. Linda Lockwood expressed her opposition to the facility saying that "mushrooms are growing through the floors in her laboratory, I find this disgusting and I think the senate should express outright indignation. We ought to scream and I urge you to scream," she said.

English professor Thomas Ashton said the $3 million would not be enough to complete the facility and future funds would derive from other sources, perhaps in tuition increases.

"I would never support a skating rink," he said.

Dean of the School of Physical Education David C. Bischoff said in an interview that the idea for a multi-purpose sports facility derived from the concern of a group of UMass alumni who worked on influencing the proposal into the House of Representatives Ways and Means Committee.

"We said yes, we need a rink, among others things, but we are not opposed. Sports has to do with the quality of student life and there is a tremendous need for recreation," Bischoff said.

Bischoff said total cost would amount into about $5½ million and the project would take three years to complete.

If the Senate Ways and Means Committee approves it and the proposal is signed by the Governor, the facility may be constructed by the Boyden lower fields and could be utilized for spring sports as will as winter, Bischoff said.

Professor of political science Jerry Mileur said the issue is not what the $3 million is spent on but "whether we get the money at all if we don't use it for a sports facility."

"If we want the alumni to support us, we have to support the alumni," Mileur said.

Faculty Senate Rules Committee Chair Chester Davis said "we are not anti-sports, we just have our priorities. After the $3 million, where will the rest of the money come from?"

EDITORIAL/OPINION

Meaning of conservatism

One of the most misunderstood ideologies or set of philosophical beliefs is contemporary conservatism. This is particularly so within college campuses -- especially in the northeastern section of the country. But why? Isn't this area one -- if not the -- most "enlightened" in the United States?

Why then, is conservatism an ideology or set of political/philosophical beliefs held only by a minority in this region? Perhaps it is not "fashionable" to be conservative on college campuses; because conservatism, by its own nature, implies maturity, frugality, prudence, (not necessarily the "moral" variety) adherence to a strong national defense, belief in the marketplace, and a greater emphasis on individual sovereignity.

Conservatives have in the past been regarded as "right-wing reactionaries" hell-bent upon preserving the status quo. Yet, don't liberals do the same thing from time-to-time when it serves their interests and special projects? Of course, and it's perfectly understandable. All sides have their reactionaries, compromisers, and outright appeasers -- and the labels we apply to each other won't alter this little, yet concrete fact one iota.

Steven Barrett

It might even be safe to say contemporary liberals dedicated towards maintaining large domestic spending programs are becoming the "reactionaries" against the Reagan Administration's attempts to reduce the effects of Big Government. Unfortunately, the Reaganites cannot reduce the size. But even in attempting to reduce the effects of Big Government, Reagan and his followers have come under attack by the present day liberal reactionaries who are trying to preserve the status quo of their large and expensive government projects.

True -- liberals can always point to the Pentagon and say, "But Reagan's not a 'true' conservative when it comes to pleasing the military." (Somehow I've never understood the liberals' unwillingness to supply the means to those who are charged with defending their ends.)

So now we see how labels and stereotypes can easily become transferable -- depending upon which side of the fence you're on. It's all part of human nature -- and if you stop and think about -- it's really one of the more amusing quirks in politics.

Yet, even after we take a look at how labels are easily transferable, and misapplied -- several perceptions about contemporary conservatism still persist. Actually, they are misperceptions; "racism" and "lack of compassion", of which I will [illegible] shortly. It's also quite possible some of the more inarticulate hard-core right wingers received more attention from the press, than they actually deserved. But they are not "true" nor "proper" representatives of conservatism and its real values and principles.

"Racism" and "lack of compassion" are two major misperceptions which haunt the more responsible conservatives; who valiantly, yet vainly try to shake them off. Bigotry is just bigotry -- not a noble ideology. It is an ugly stain upon the soul of mankind -- not an inclusive and integral part of anyone's ideological beliefs.

True conservatives who respect the individual dignity and sovereignity of a person's character are properly indignant when bigotry overshadows the intellectual content of an argument, either pro or con.

"Lack of compassion" is often misunderstood. Wheras the quest for peace through strength is often misconstrued into "warmongering;" frugality in public spending is translated into harshness and uncaring cheapness. But what about inordinately high taxes?

Yes indeed though, several "conservatives" like the Nazis, KKK, and other more extremist elements scattered throughout the "new right" movement give a black-eye to an otherwise wholly respectable movement, the rise of conservatism. But even liberals cannot, and should not always be blamed for what the radical left and communists do either.

When I began this column, I never intended to solve the differences between conservatives and liberals. No man or woman could. What I am proposing, however, is a call for a lecture series or symposium about conservatism and its relationship with its counterpart: liberalism. Surely this great institution could welcome such an undertaking since it'll only help to increase the public's awareness about political ideologies.

A couple of years ago, this university witnessed an attempt to bring a badly needed touch of "civility" to all members of the campus community. Perhaps the same zeal could be put into a drive to increase our political understanding

Dialogue yes, rhetoric no

To the Editor,

In response to Stephen Erickson's recent polemic ("Republicans get a Bum Rap") about the so called "attacks" on himself and other members of the recently formed University Republican Club, I offer the following thoughts. Implied, very covertly, in Mr. Erickson's remarks is that A), American liberalism has nothing more to offer than irrational rantings, emanating from no logical base and that B) Any strongly negative, even insulting, opinion of national leaders is "immature" and intellectually unsupportable. I contend that such a view is alien to our democratic tradition of full and free dialogue and certainly runs counter to Mr. Erickson's plea for an end to name calling and a start to rational dialogue.

Interestingly, Mr. Erickson fails to mention that it is the Right Wing in America who have consistently engaged in name calling above and beyond the normal calls to political rhetoric. One only has to remember the McCarthy witch hunts, the "eggheads" that Richard Nixon so much resented, the moderate "traitors" that Barry Goldwater led the charge against, and even up to today to the "fascist" elements Ronald Reagan reminds us exist in our political institutions, and yes the "Communist" Civil Rights leaders that Jesse Helms insists spearheaded the Civil Rights campaign.

Mr. Erickson accurately points out the intellectual vacuity of Josh Meyer's column on nuclear war. Mr. Meyer makes simplistic generalizations about Ronald Reagan and his policies and fails to back up his generalizations with either evidence or argument. However, the crucial point is that the lack of evidence presented does not mean the evidence does not exist. There is ample evidence that Mr. Reagan is a gross ignoramus, surrounded by people almost equally as ignorant, and that members of his administration have deliberately distorted the truth both domestically and foreign policy wise. However, often when I attempt to offer supportive evidence of such general statements, conservative friends of mine plug up their ears and charge me with being simplistic and unreasonable.

It seems to me that the underlying, perhaps unconscious, assumptions that such people make, including Mr. Erickson, is that strong and commited beliefs especially those that may degrade our nations leaders are to be bitterly opposed and hooted down as quickly as possible. I do not consider it unreasonable of Josh Meyer to call Mr. Reagan's policies "insane" or to describe members of his administration as "miserable cohorts" and yes I do find Republican policies, in general, to be "demented". The mistake of Mr. Meyer and others is that they do not support their generalizations with hard evidence. However, I'm more convinced that it is the language itself and not Mr. Meyer's neglect that has irritated conservatives.

We often forget that our American tradition is based on strong and vituperative opinion. The American revolutionaries did not fight with ambiguous thoughts about their British opponents and similarly we did not fight World War II with any illusions about the Nazis. Americans fight hard because they believe strongly, and that goes for American liberals as well as anyone else. Anyone can agree with Mr. Erickson's violin credenza filled call to open minded debate, but we dare not let polite words get in the way of our realization that powerful immoral forces are at loose before us, and one of those forces is the threat of nuclear conflict.

In closing, let me say that I don't believe there is enough rational public policy debate on this campus. The strong words are there to be seen but there is little to be seen of substantive debate. I advocate that a public policy debate by conducted each week on campus. Every week at a set time and place we should have a new subject and new speakers, liberal, conservative, and independent to voice strong opinions and yet to engage us in informed, detailed dialogue on the vital questions of our day. I invite Mr. Erickson and his comrades to join in such an effort.

The song is not the same

I did not go home to New Jersey for Thanksgiving this year. Prompted by the advancing due-date of a 15-page research paper, I forsook turkey and pumpkin pie to spend Thanksgiving break hunched over my typewriter, solitarily starving.

Actually, that's a lie designed for a certain professor, who has hopefully turned the page by now. I had a hell of a good time chowing down with my cousins from Brookfield.

However, I did make it home a few weeks ago, and managed to catch a football game at Matawan Regional High School, my alma mater. That esteemed institution has, despite the dispersion of the Class of 1982, remained standing and reasonably healthy. Nevertheless, my visit was disconcerting. There have been, to say the least, a lot of changes there in the past year and a half. A lot.

Elizabeth Luciano

To begin with, sandblasters have done away with the very best of our graffitti. "Class of '82, this Bud's for you!" has been banished from the roof of the field house, as has the less cultural epigram, "Screw me in '83." The Class of '84 hasn't been too creative yet, but they'll probably keep up the tradition and come up with some witty little slogan.

The problem with the new grafitti at my old high school is that I can't figure out who all the initials belong to. What fun is it to know that R.S. loves T.I., if you don't know who R.S. and T.I. are? According the gym wall, S.G. has done some things too obscene for me to report here. That information could be both interesting and useful, if I could fill in the other letters. But I can't.

Another noticable change pertains to the grandstands which have shrunken by at least 30 percent. They shriveled, just like my levi's after a good washing and five extra pounds. Nobody at the game that day would admit this, but I swear it's true. In fact, everything at Matawan Regional looked smaller, including the students.

The marching band, clad in the same uniforms used during my stint as a flag majorette, had the kind of faces you see on the Campbell Soup kids. And the females (I'm not sure whether the proper term is 'women' or 'girls' in this instance), were dressed for the nightclub scene, not a football skirmish. Rhinestone-studded blouses glittered above silver lycra pants — no joke.

"How do they get all that make-up off?" I asked Mr. Post, my old English teacher, "Chisels or sledgehammers?" I paused, and added, "I never went to football games looking that ridiculous!"

Mr. Post shot me an odd look and coughed. "Yes, you did." He informed my quietly.

I had a sudden rush of recollections of high school. Yes, I had cheered on the mighty Huskies from beneath an inch-thick coating of Desert Fawn foundation! I had purposely matched my nail polish to my lip gloss! It was time to confess.

"I'm guilty," I admitted.

Checking out the old place was fun, but once a year is sufficient. So much changes, or maybe we're the ones who do the changing. At any rate, I wouldn't turn the clock back, even if I could.

And that's something to be thankful for.

Professor says Third World effort needed in feminism

By DARLENE JACKSON
Collegian Correspondent

Gloria Joseph, a self-proclaimed black feminist, author and professor at Hampshire College spoke Wednesday on "Third World Women and Feminism" at the University of Massachusetts.

"In order to obtain the most effective result, we must unite with other Third World brothers and sisters. We must be concerned with the struggle of Third World women here as well as abroad," she said.

Joseph said Third World women must strive for an atmosphere that is free from the fear of economic and political oppression.

"As Third World women, we face racial oppression in every arena possible," she said.

Third World women produce, consume and are commodities for multinational corporations, she said. "In order to be a Third World woman feminist, one must be concerned with the workings and the effects of the multinational," Joseph said.

Joseph said she believes white feminists are not joined by Black feminists in their struggle for equality because of low economic conditions and the association of feminism with lesbianism.

"Black feminists do not want this kind of connotative association," she said.

Another influential factor, she said is the movement is white, middle class oriented and does not see the needs of blacks. But the most significant factor is white women's attitudes in dealing with racism, she said.

Joseph said it is understandable that black feminists and other Third World women are not working together.

"We haven't recognized each other's problems. The government keeps the group divided," she said.

"There should be a conscientious effort made to work towards this unity."

"Black feminist are aware of the overwhelming stress placed upon black men by society and work towards combatting them, she said. However, this is no reason for the harsh treatment of Third World women by Third World men, she said.

"They fail to overcome their sexism and help in the struggle," she said. This is not to say both can not work together, but not until these differences are recognized and understood, can they work together effectively, she said.

"It is not a battle of the sexes. It is a matter of understanding. Third World women must determine their own destiny," she said.

Gloria Joseph citing the lack of involvement by Third World women in a lecture sponsored by the Third World women's program of the EveryWomen's Center at UMass.

Trailers by Andy Gordon

We're into December and as the year comes toward a close, critics and film writers everywhere will be choosing their favorite pictures of the year. It's still too early to do so, as the studios traditionally save their quality films for this season, but I thought I'd get a jump by choosing my ten favorite films of all time. If you look closely at the following list, you'll notice a recurring theme prevalent in all the films; an idealistic protagonist, be their idealism directed toward love, duty, justice or humanity; and ultimately a reinforcement of the positive aspects of life.

To Kill a Mockingbird -- Gregory Peck won an Oscar for his portrayal of Atticus Finch, a small-town Southern lawyer who defends a black man wrongly charged with rape. With Robert Duvall in his first film as Boo Radley.

Miracle on 34th St. -- Edmund Gwenn got the Oscar for his Santa Claus, put on trial for lunacy by a crew of stiffs. The scene where businesswoman Maureen O'Hara tells an eight-year-old Natalie Wood that he really is Santa Claus never fails to bring tears to my eyes. I'm talking about the 1947 version, not the recent remake with David Hartman and Mr. French.

12 Angry Men -- Director Sidney Lumet's first film puts an amazing cast -- including Henry Fonda, Lee J. Cobb, E.G. Marshall, Jack Warden, Martin Balsam and Jack Klugman -- into a small jury room to deliberate over a murder trial. Eleven vote for execution, Fonda has doubts. Flawless plotting and character study.

Mister Roberts -- Fonda again, here as a naval officer stuck aboard a garbage scow during World War II. James Cagney is the despicable captain and Jack Lemmon in his greatest role as the lazy, womanizing Ensign Pulver.

The Caine Mutiny -- Another sea story, this one centering around Van Johnson as a naval officer who, during a storm, relieves the unfit captain of his rule; And of his eventual court martial. Humphrey Bogart is fantastic as the paranoid Captain Queeg, as are Jose Ferrer as a lawyer and Fred MacMurray, here playing a real bastard.

Breakfast at Tiffany's -- Blake Edward's greatest film stars Audrey Hepburn and George Peppard as neighbors, with Mickey Rooney in a hilarious role as the Japanese photographer upstairs. The closing scene is heart-stopping.

Some of the women Burt Reynolds loves in The Man who Loved Women. (Note: the answer to this week's trivia question is not contained in this photo).

Director Blake Edwards. Breakfast at Tiffany's was his first film, The Man who Loved Women is his latest.

The Graduate -- Mike Nichols. Dustin Hoffman. Katherine Ross. Anne Bancroft. Magic. You've seen it, you know what I'm saying. A great line: "It's like I'm playing some sort of game, but the rules are being made up by all the wrong people. No, no one's making them up, they're making themselves up."

Summer of 42 -- Beautiful tale of adolescence and rites of passage with Gary Grimes, Jerry Houser and Jennifer O'Neill. Herman Raucher's screenplay has classic narrative -- "Life is made up of small comings and goings, and for everything we take with us there is something we leave behind."

Harold and Maude -- Hal Ashby's wonderful story of the relationship between an eighty year-old woman and a twenty year-old man is warm, sad, touching and extremely funny. It's power is evidenced by the massive cult following which will catch the film any time it's playing within ten miles.

Some other great movies which not coincidentally also fit into those prerequisites of idealism are It's a Wonderful Life, Great Expectations, Breaking Away, The Turning Point, Local Hero and Diner. These films are my favorites, next week TRAILERS will print the favorites of students. Titles may be sent this week to TRAILERS C/O The Collegian, 113 Campus Center through campus mail.

Local Best Bets: The Dead Zone is back at the Hampshire 4. The picture left for a week to make room for the blockbuster smash hit Nate and Hayes (see review next week). The Dead Zone is exciting, spooky and features great performances by Christopher Walken, Martin Sheen and Geza Kovacs (The Fez). Amherst Cinema has Angelo My Love and The Great Santini tonight and tomorrow. Mt. Farms has A Night in Heaven (Don't make me gack), which is this week's flick to avoid.

TRAILERS Trivia: No one got last week's question correct. General Hospital fans can catch Alan Quartermaine (Stuart Damon) in Star 80, the biopic of the late Dorothy Stratton. The pic opens here sometime after finals. This week's question: The Man who Loved Women, Blake Edward's remake of the Truffaut classic, is scheduled for release the 19th, in it, in various roles, are four Playboy playmates. What are their names? The first five correct answers will receive passes to a special Columbia Pictures sneak preview of the film Christine, which opens a week from today. More on The Man who Loved Women next week.

Truth, Trust, Pain, Beauty and other stuff

By GERARD COSLOY
Collegian Staff

What's at issue here is not QUALITY. What's at issue here is not TALENT. What's at issue here is not VIRTUOSITY. I'm not reviewing records to confirm already held opinion; the questions I grapple with while listening to music aren't confined to the turntable — they're meant to apply to everyday life (but sometimes they don't). The issues that ARE at stake in this column are TRUTH, TRUST, and PAIN. Ever feel like you didn't care if you died, just so long as you spent 5 minutes gaining the sense of purpose everyone else assumes unattainable? Me too (maybe). PARTY TIME doesn't equal TRUTH, but TRUTH could equal PARTY TIME — and so much more! (If we can spend 5 minutes sensing our own strength, we won't need God, Hangar One, or Stroh's). Confused? Read on:

THE ASSEMBLY — "Never Never" (Mute Import 45) — Not as light and frothy as it seems, the Assembly's debut 45 is tortured adolescence at it's most melodic. Vince Clarke & Eric Radcliffe (both ex-Yazoo, Depeche Mode) team up with suddenly unemployed Undertones vocalist Feargal Sharkey to produce "Never Never," as well crafted a tear-jerker as anything the Undertones ever came up with. Not the most predictable of collaborations, nor the most predictable of results.

THE CURE — "The Love Cats" (Fiction 12" Import) — Another surprise here, the Cure taking an unexpected sidetrack from their recent synth-drone forays ("Let's Go To Bed," "The Walk"), and opting for a sparese, jazzy/skiffle approach. Brushes hit the snare, bass slaps and Robert Smith sings his most appealing vocals since the first LP. Bright, airy, and fun.

THE SMITHS — "This Charming Man" (Rough Trade 12") — "...I've nothing to wear/it's gruesome that someone so handsome should care;" the unmarked terrain where a Mancucian intellect like Howard Devoto merges with a Mancucian laborer like Mark E. Smith? Instantly accessable yet instantly breaking off on newer tangents, Manchester's Smiths understand all too well that the machinery of pop is too dilicate to be bludgeneoned, but to corrupt not to be sliced. Subversion that might fool us at the first listen, the Smiths could be one of 84's best, so long as they keep both feet on the ground.

DEEP WOUND — Reconstructing The Border Of Crumbs (Radiobeat 7" EP) — Localism rules, OK? Half of this bunch are UMass students (voxman Charles, drummer J), which if this record wasn't so good, would be enough info to disregard it on. BUT DON'T. Few American bands today (save for the broken-up Flesh Eaters or Ann Arbour's Negative Approach) have an HC/metal groove that can match that of Deep Wound...or the potential to expand (check out the unfortunately titled "Dead Babies," a 'pop' crossover hit if I've ever heard one).

ICICLE WORKS — "Love Is A Wonderful Colour" (Beggar's Banquet 45).

JULIAN COPE — "Sunshine Playroom" (Mercury 12") —

As the Smiths once again show us, Manchester produces original voices with a fine degree of consistency. Liverpool, on the other hand, is a city forever emulating the Crucial 3 (Wylie/MacCulloch/Cope) with more pretenders each year. Like the hapless Dead Or Alive, Ellery Bop, Black and It's Immaterial before them, the Icicle Works (name stolen from William Burroghs) shamelessly lift the chord patterns and vocal stylings of the Teardrop Explodes with (predictably) little success. Unlike their passable "Birds Fly" 45, the Works' "Love" is an uncoordinated mess; isn't this what producers are for? Julian Cope, for his part, is as original and flaky as ever; "Sunshine Playroom" rushes harder than most Teardrop material ever did, plus with a clearer tone.

THE THREE O'CLOCK — Sixteen Tambourines (Frontier LP)

RAIN PARADE — Emergency Third Rail Power Trip (Enigma LP) —

California dreamin' I hope. The 3 O'Clock LP (second if you count the Salvation Army, which I'm not) moves the band into strict bubblegum territory tongue being more than slightly in cheek. "Jet Fighter Man" would've done Bolan proud; "A Day In Erotica" uses the studio trickery of producer Earle Mankey (ex-Beach Boys Engineer) to full extent. Primed for the pages of 16 Magazine, the Three O'Clock have come up with their finest record yet. And where the Three O'Clock are now grabbing the milkshakes, the Rain Parade thankfully still prefer kool-aid with more than liberal amounts of acid thrown in. The new version of "What's She's Done To Your Mind" is even more of a Byrds rip off than the original, consequently making it my favorite sont this month. Come to think of it, "I look Around" sounds quite a bit like pieces of revolver, here and there, but I won't tell if you won't.

On a brief aside Cath E. Trix has organised an all ages hardcore gig taking place this Saturday night at 5pm. at the Greenfield Guiding Star Grange. Featured will be Psycho, Chronic Disorder, Zero Mentality, Reflex from pain, the Outpatients and Grey Matter. For more info, call Cath at 546-6262).

Win movie tickets!

The Collegian and Columbia Pictures will be giving away passes to Richard Pryor, Here and Now, Christine, and The Man who Loved Women this month. Check TRAILERS weekly for trivia questions.

UMass and college basketball Extra

By PETER ABRAHAM
Collegian Staff

Despite blowing a 22 point lead before beating New Hampshire Tuesday night you have to like the 1983-84 version of the Massachusetts basketball team. Coach Ron Gerlufsen's bunch was on way to a rare blowout of a Minuteman opponent before they were hit by the dreaded "mental lapses." Still, they play periods of sparkling hoop when they controlled both ends of the floor.

But once Atlantic 10 Conference play sets in the team will not be able to lose their edge for extended times without flirting with disaster. The likes of St. Joseph's and Temple figure to make conference play rough and West Virginia, St. Bonaventure and George Washington are no walkovers. As for Rhode Island, Duquesne and Penn State - two are bad and the other is worse.

You have to wonder what the Wildcats were thinking on the way home, Edwin Green rejected a few of their shots with his shoulders, never mind his hands. The rangy center was credited with only three blocks on the stat sheet but actually directed a few more UNH attempts away from the net.

According to a local paper forward John Hempel is becoming a quote "nice guy." Tell that to the Wildcats. The burly 6-7 sophomore ripped down nine rebounds with some agressive play under the boards. He also poured in 16 points as did Horace Neysmith and Donald Russell.

Let's hope the Minutemen aren't looking past Bentley toward sunny Florida and the Stetson Tournament which starts on December 9th, UMass will play Georgia Southern, Houston Baptist and Stetson in the tourney. UCLA, North Carolina and Kentucky they're not but each had respectable records last year. All three are little schools with enrollments under 6,000. While down South, UMass will also face powerful Duke. A 4-1 record isn't too much to expect before coming home.

On to the national scene: I can't understand why Stonehill continues to beat their heads against the wall by scheduling Boston College every year. It took the Eagles less than four minutes ot jump out to a 12-0 lead before coasting in for the easy win.

Jim Valvano

N.C. State Coach Jim Valvano has an idea. He wants his 5-6 guard Spud Webb to jump center against 5-3 (that's right, 5-3) Wake Forest guard Tyrone "The Human Assist" Bogues when the two ACC teams meet on January 21st.

Sounds like an entertaining idea from the witt Italian.

My pick for the darkhorse challanger for the national championship is Iowa. The Hawkeyes have 6-11 forward Michael Payne and 6-10 center Greg Stokes, both good scorers and rebounders. Inconsistent Lute Olson is gone as coach and capable George Raveling is at the helm after leading Washington State to a 23-7 season. Raveling should go far with the talent he has.

of timing and flexibility which results in, at best, slipshod routines, and at worse, injuries.

Enough pessimism! The only thing the Minutewomen can control and therefore should worry about is their performance in the gym. Tonight could be the start of a very good year.

For gymnastic fans, tonight's meet is the first and last chance to see UMass gymnastics in competition this semester. The next women's meet is January 14th against Duke at home, so be at Boyden at 7:00 tonight for the UMass Invitational.

somersault dismount in a layout position.

Tri-captain Willie Stevens has been working on his routine and is adding a double back somersault with a full twist.

"We're exceptionally strong in high bar," Johnson said. "Tony and Bert will be the leaders. They get through a lot of sets (in practice)."

Looking forward to a winning season, last year the Minutemen defeated Army in the first match of the season and finished ahead of their rivals in the Eastern Intercollegiate Gymnastics League Championships. UMass posted a fourth place finish behind East Strousburg, Navy and top finisher Southern Connecticut. Army will be tough but the UMass squad is confident in its skills and routines.

I think the total moves thrown and all, that we'll have a better team," Johnson said "It is really important that everybody concentrates on executing whether than worrying who's the better team.

Another women's team with an impressive winning record starts its season tonight as the University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics team hosts New Hampshire, Connecticut, and Northeastern in the UMass Invitational at Boyden at 7 p.m.

Last year UMass was 11-2 and they have lost only two players to graduation. Add a talented freshman class to an already experienced group of performers and it is evident that the potential exists for an even better season this year and in the long run.

"We're off to a slow start," said coach Ken Anderson. "We have a lot of people coming off of injuries and illnesses and we are experimenting with modern tricks."

However, Anderson sees this year's squad improving on the second place finish in the Atlantic 10 and the fifth place finish in the NCAA Eastern Championships achieved by UMass last season.

"Last year's team was strong and consistent. However, we have to push for bonus points with new tricks. Some of the girls are not ready with their routines yet but it will make us better toward the end of the season. We hope to surprise some people," concluded Anderson.

For the uninitiated, women's gymnastics consists of four events -- the floor exercise, the balance beam, the uneven bars, and the vault. Each team enters six competitors in each event with the top five scores counting. Three of the six must compete in all four events.

In the Invitational tonight the three all-arounds figure to be senior Robin Low, who has been a top all-around for four years, Jennifer Pancoast, who is making her "debut" after sitting out last year with a back injury, and Maureen Sutherby, a promising freshman.

Others who will be competing at the Invitational are Sue Allen, who is "coming on very strong" according to Anderson, on the uneven bars and balance beam; Lisa Griffin, who is a floor exercise and vault specialist; senior co-captain Barbara Lord, who will compete in her specialty, the balance beam; Yael Kantor, who is bothered by bursitis of the shoulder, but will, at the very least, vault; Elizabeth Janney, who is recovering from a broken finger, and will also vault; Abigail Farris, who was out all last year with a knee injury, will be in the floor exercises; and Tricia Harrity and Tricia Camus will both be on the uneven bars.

> "Last year's team was strong and consistent. However, we have to push for bonus points with new tricks. We hope to surprise some people."
> -- Ken Anderson

"The last two weeks the line-up has pulled together," remarked Anderson. "It is our first meet and we are just looking for solid routines."

At the Invitational, UNH figures to be the Minutewomen's toughest competition. They beat UMass last year and finished second in the NCAA Eastern Championships.

This is UConn's first year in Division I and they have never beaten UMass. However, as they do with most of their sports programs, UConn is putting lots of money and scholarships into gymnastics, so they could prove to be tough.

Northeastern is the unknown, the dark horse, of the meet.

As the Minutewomen prepare to start what looks to be a promising season, their biggest problem may not be with the competition but with the lack of money forthcoming from the Athletic Department.

Two years ago the Athletic Department, in its ultimate wisdom, decided that the women's gymnastics team no longer needed scholarships. That decision will cause an inevitable decline in the quality of gymnasts who decide to enroll at UMass. There is a more pressing problem, however.

"My biggest concern is the lack of support women sports get during intersession," Anderson said. "They are expected to compete, eat, and live without aid. I cannot afford to pay for everyone to come back. I might not be able to compete with a full team."

If the worse happens, the Minutewomen will be forced to compete at less than full strength for four meets, which is one third of their season. A team cannot participate successfully at the college level with such a handicap.

Also, in gymnastics, a layoff means a loss

Massachusetts Karate Club wins the New England title

Special to the Collegian

In an impressive display of graceful skill and strength, the Massachusetts Karate Club from the University of Massachusetts, Amherst, gained its hard-earned and well deserved place as new England's finest collegiate team by winning the New England Title.

On November 20, Boston College's Roberts Center hosted the bi-annual New England College Karate Tournament. The competition was tight, readily supplied by over fifteen prominent schools including Boston College, M.I.T., Dartmouth, Columbia, University of Lowell, UMass/Boston, Tufts, Boston University, North Eastern, Yale, and harvard, along with UMass' own Massachusetts Karate Club.

The 7-hour affair provided for a long -- but never dull -- day of eliminations and fight-offs in several catagories of KATA (forms competition) and KUMITE (free fighting).

Massachusetts Karate began the day by claiming first, third, and fourth in Women's Novice Individual Kumite and a second place finish in Women's KATA. In Advanced Team Competition, the spirited Massachusetts team cleaned up. Grasping first in Team Kata were Captain Ray Stone, Jeff Laughlin, Diane Weingartner, Joe Moriarty, and Brian Marley, defeating Bridgewater State, UMass/Boston, and the highly competitive sedond place team of M.I.T. brought about their victory.

The climax of the competition -- Advanced Team Kumite -- was, again, claimed by the Massachusetts Karate team, with a superb effort by Stone, Laughlin, Moriarty, Marley, and John Mileszko, who replaced Weingartner. An intense battle against second-place M.I.T. brought about their victory.

Laughlin and Moriarty placed second in the Boston Battle (2-on-2 full contact) competition and team members Stone and Brian Marley received further awards in recognition of their excellent fighting styles.

The Men's Novice Team Kumite did not finish in any of the top 3 spots, they are awaiting another shot in the next tournament.

Also on hand as two of the referees were coaches Keith Gauthier and Frank Paolino, and honoring all present was Sensee Kazumi Tabata, Master of all New England college teams.

After several years of hard work and much anticipation, the highly successful day for the Massachusetts karate team was indeed a well earned reward.

Men's swimming to Lowell

Co-captain Mark Surette | Co-captain Chris Porter

The University of Massachusetts men's swimming team will be going for their second straight win of the year as they travel to meet the University of Lowell tomorrow at 3 pm.

Russ Yarworth's troops picked up their first win of the year on Tuesday as freshman Mile Hoover's three first places boosted UMass to a narrow 57-56 win over Tufts. UMass is now 1-0.

Co-captains Chris Porter and Mark Surette along with Chris Clarke and diver John Macurdy won for the Minutemen.

The UMass women's swimming team, led by co-captains Martha Sweeney and Liz Feinberg is idle until December 11 when they host the University of Maine.

UMass gymnasts looking to excel

Men opening season tomorrow out at Army

By ELLEN RICHARD
Collegian Staff

With improved skills and most of last year's team coming back, the University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics team is looking forward to a successful season and will try to earn its first win tomorrow at West Point against Army.

The Minutemen have improved in all six events with their strongest being the high bar. Against Army, the team will be executing riskier skills. Sophomores Joe Demarco and Phil Gorgone will lead the Minutemen in the floor exercises by performing a double back somersault in their routines. Coach Roy Johnson said although he is not sure of Army's squad, Doug Garmer will be one gymnast to beat on floor.

"Phil and Joe could match up to him (Garmer) on floor," Johnson said. "Jim Corbett is in there too with a nice, clean set on floor."

Ken Dougherty and Bert Mathieson will be the top competitors on the pommel horse event. Dougherty, a transfer student who was uneligible to compete last year, is swinging well for the Minutemen and has shown improvement, according to Johnson.

Mathieson has been adding difficult tricks and improving old ones. Freshman Steve Baia is a new face on the team this season and may be used in pommel horse, his best event, if needed.

SWINGING MAN -- Bert Mathieson works out on the pommel horse during a meet last season. Mathieson, a senior, and his teammates open their season tomorrow traveling to West Point.

"We have to get down the routines that we have," Stevens said. "We don't want any breaks (in the routine) — that's five-tenths (off) right there and that hurts the score."

Along with pommel horse, Mathieson will perform a full twisting back somersault dismount off of the still rings. The Minutemen have improved their giant swings, swinging with straight arms and have added difficult moves while swinging in their routines. Johnson said he is looking forward to a stronger ring team than last year.

The last three events look just as good as the first three. Ending with the team's strongest event —the high bar — is a big boost for the Minutemen. The parellel bars event is not as promising but should come.

The vaulting event is another strong event which should bring the team some good scores.

"It's probably the most consistent vaulting team we've had in a long time," Coach Johnson said. "The vaults all start from 9.4 and up. Everyone hit their vaults standing up. They're pretty consistent. Jim Corbett and Tony Sbarra vaulting has improved drastically."

It will be Dougherty and Mathieson again in the parallel bars event. Both will be performing double back somersaults as a dismount off the bars.

Dismounts off the high bar will be a nice sight to see and the routines are spiced up with some difficult moves. Demarco and Sbarra have cushioned their routines with some risk tricks and both include a double

McQuaide overcomes operation

Minutemen travel to Coast Guard tournament

By JOHN BADGER
Collegian Correspondent

Although the UMass wrestling team is off to a dismal start this season, there are a few bright spots. The brightest spot is the wrestling captain Scott McQuaide. The 167 lb senior is 2-0 regardless of the fact that he's only four weeks off of a hernia operation.

"The major problem with the operation was that I lost a lot of work-out time. I couldn't do nearly as much weight lifting or roadwork as I would have liked to while I was recuperating. I'm not in the shape I'd like to be in," said McQuaide. "I'm wrestling well but I'm a little worried about the Coast Guard tournament this weekend. I'll be wrestling three to five matches a day and my stamina will really be tested. If I had been working all year I'd want first place this weekend, now I'll be happy with a finish in the top three."

McQuaide went 20-7 last year but has changed his style slightly. "Scott's a more controlled wrestler this year," explains coach Rick Freitas. "Last year he'd do a lot more scrambling and banging heads with an opponent. He's still very aggressive but he's not inclined to give up as many points as last year."

Wrestling at 167 pounds, McQuaide finds himself in one of the toughest weight classes. Among upcoming opponents for McQuaide is Boston College's Bill Hanlon. Hanlon was dropping down to 167 this year.

"I'm looking forward to wrestling him more than anybody," said McQuaide, "I realy don't like B.C. and I don't like Hanlon even more. Win, lose, or draw he's going to know he's been in a match when I'm through with him." New Hampshire's returning conference champion at the 158 class last year, David Yale, is also going to be at 167 this year. "Yale worries me more than anybody because he wrestles a style similar to my own and he's very tough, but I'll be ready for him. The main thing I'm looking forward to this year is the New England's. This is my last year and I'm looking forward to placing high in that tourney."

> "I really don't like B.C. and I don't like Hanlon... Win, lose or draw he's going to know he's been in a match when I'm through with him."
> -- Scott McQuaide

"I've always thought of myself as a team player. I'd much rather have the team win than myself," said McQuaide. "I feel bad for these freshmen who are coming right out of high school and starting against much more experienced division one wrestlers. Most of these guys should be second or third stringers this year for the learning experience. When I was a freshman I couldn't touch the starter. I was a backup and was afforded the time to learn before my first match. These guys aren't getting that chance. It's really too bad."

Give 118 pounder Rich Gardiner credit for his performance against Hofstra Tuesday. Although the Dutchmen forfeited that spot, Gardiner pinned Hofstra's ineligible starter Dion Dye in an exhibition match.

The grapplers lost their heavy weight to the weightroom last week. Football coach Bob Pickett felt 260 lb. offensive guard Mike Dwyer would do better lifting weights instead of wrestling. Dwyer's presence against Boston University last week was enough to make the Terriers forfeit that spot. Cleveland Browns noseguard Bob Golic says that he owes his ablity to handle giants like Steeler's Mike Webster to his college wrestling career.

UMass travels to The Coast Guard Invitational tournament this weekend before hosting Southern Connecticut next Tuesday at 7:30 pm. Southern Connecticut is among the top 20 in division two and is ranked eighth in New England overall.

OUTSTANDING -- Jon Segal, of the UMass men's team, skis in a race last year. The men's and women's teams were both invited to the NCAA regionals and the men went 64-6 while winning the NEISC and the women went 65-0 while winning the WISC. The teams start competing in January.

Minutemen seek to ground Falcons

Bentley comes to the Cage for rare afternoon contest Saturday at 1:30

By GERRY deSIMAS
Collegian Staff

It doesn't happen that often except in Hollywood or in a case when the entire starting lineup is freshman that a freshman will cooly put the ball off the backboard after a double pump fake in a sea of redwoods (players that are all taller) and that shot wins the game.

But it happened for rookie point guard Carl Smith Tuesday in the win over New Hampshire after UMass had blown a 22 point lead. Besides that all that this freshman, the only one to start, did was direct the offense at the point and score seven points.

All in a day's work. Smith and his Minuteman teammates hope the work of winning ball games will continue tomorrow at 1:30 p.m. as UMass takes on Bentley, a division II team from the Northeastern Eight, in the Cage.

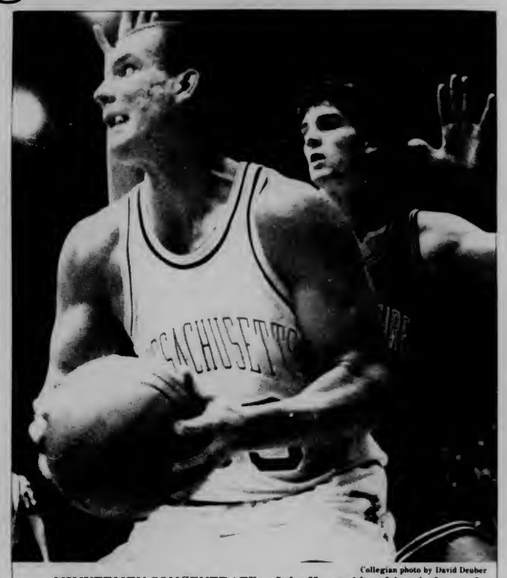
Smith and the team are ready to correct their mistakes that made the Wildcat game close. "We want to play pressure defense all over," Smith said. They have also worked on their in-bounds play, which gave them trouble against UNH.

"I didn't panic," Smith said. "They were doubling our one man (the one Carl was supposed to inbounds it to) so we changed the routine and brought three back. We'll be more prepared for that situation. I don't think that will happen again."

The biggest thing to correct will be the intensity of the player players on the floor. "We are looking to again improve in our areas of weakness," head coach Ron Gerlufsen said. "This game will be another test to do those things correctly."

The mental intensity for a full 40 minutes, ball handling and the ability to play good individual defense are the areas Gerlufsen wants to see improvement.

"We have intensity for 40 minutes. We can't have any letdowns," Gerlufsen said. "We're looking forward to the game."



So is Bentley, probably. Even though they have lost to UMass the past three years, it has never been an easy win for the Minutemen. The Falcons beat UMass twice in 1979. Coach Brian Hammel's team, which played Merrimack last night, is led by Todd Orlando (14.9 average last year) and Jerry Siezenski (10.4 last year). Orlando is also the team's top rebounder.

The Minutemen would like to win this unique afternoon game because it would send them off on their Southern swing with a 2-0 record. No UMass team since Jack Leaman's 15-12 1977-78 team had done that.

"We have a real tough stretch coming up, but we don't want to look ahead. It will be important to be 2-0. It will be a real credit to our players if we can accomplish that," Gerlufsen said as he rushed out of Curry Hicks last night so he could go scout Bentley.

The starting five remains intact with Carl Smith at the point, co-captain Donald Russell at the shooting position, John Hempel and Horace Neysmith at forwards and co-captain Edwin Green in the middle.

MINUTEMAN MUBLINGS -- The guards combined for seven steals in the game against UNH (4 by Russell)...Craig Smith, the first guard of the bench played very well shooting 3 of 4 from the floor in scoring his six points...Bobby Braun also saw a lot of time at forward.

MINUTEMEN CONCENTRATE -- John Hempel has his mind on only one thing -- the hoop -- in Tuesday's win over UNH. Hempel will give the hoop his undivided attention tomorrow against Bentley.

Winning is not everything, but the first victory of any season comes awfully close. The University of Massachusetts women's basketball team has not hit the road yet, nor have they hit the win column. Tomorrow night, the women hope to obtain their first victory of the young season, before hitting the road for their first road game.

UMass hopes to make the University of Vermont their first victims of the '83-'84 season. The Catamounts invade Curry Hicks Cage tomorrow to tap off against the women hoopsters at 7:00 p.m.

Vermont is currently 0-2. Their losses came at the hands of division II St. Michaels College and division I Holy Cross. Considering their similar records, the contest should be very exciting, with both teams in search of their first victories of the year.

The Catamounts, who went 4-20 last year under now departed head coach Jean Condon, have eleven lettermen returning. Tops among them is senior Shelia Martin, the second leading scorer for Vermont last year with a 8.7 average. Martin, at 5'7 will be at the guard position.

Lisa Johnson, a 5'11 senior forward, who owns several UVM records will also be a top gun for new head coach Robin Markey, a 1982 graduate of Tennessee Tech, ranked sixth in the nation at one point.

Johnson, who scored a team high 15 points in last year's loss to UMass, averaged 8.6 points a game and was the team's second highest rebounder. Vermont will be just as hungry as UMass for a win.

"We're not going to do anything different, we've been falling, just short, we have to get a little better in every department...and I think we are."
-- Barbara Stevens

UMass head coach Barbara Stevens views the upcoming game this way: "They (Vermont) are a scrappy team, they can lull you into a pattern and make you play their game. We're not going to do anything different, we've been falling just short, we have to get a little better in every department...and I think we are."

Karen Kamminger picked up the scoring against St. John as she sank 22 while forward Barbara Hebel hit for 14 and Rebecca Kuchs scored 13 including five for five from the line.

Senior point guard Wendy Ward and Hebel active defensively with four steals each hope to combine with their teammates to keep Vermont at bay.

In their last contest against a tough St. John's team, UMass was only 7 points from a victory. Last year against Vermont, UMass won by a 63-59 margin. For first year coach Stevens, any margin of victory will suffice. The first win will not be 'everything' but it could be the start of something good.

Crampton R.A. arrested for dorm fire

By PAUL BASKEN
Collegian Staff

A Crampton Dormitory Resident Assistant will be arraigned this morning in Hampshire District Court in Northampton of charges of setting one of the 16 fires that have plagued the all-women dormitory this semester.

Yvette I. Henry, a 20-year-old senior chemistry major from Philadelphia, "was charged Friday night with two complaints alleging burning the personal property of another," University of Massachusetts police said.

The two counts, referring to both personal and state property, stem from the single fire set Tuesday on the desk of a resident in Room 209, which is next door to Henry's, according to Janet Rowe Dugan, clerk magistrate of Hampshire District Court.

Henry was taken early the following morning to Franklin County Jail in Greenfield after Dugan set bail at $10,000. She was released yesterday afternoon after posting bond of $1,000, which was raised in part by contributions from fellow residents in Crampton Dormitory.

About one half hour after Henry had left Crampton Friday, University police, in conjunction with state fire marshal Jay Bowman, made a decision to activate the fire alarm in Crampton Dormitory to "evacuate the building and make an inspection of a number of the common areas of the building," said Phil Cavanaugh, associate director of Public Safety.

However, the "administrative search" had no relation to the subsequent arrest, said Hampshire County District Attorney W. Michael Ryan, as "anything found cannot be used in court."

Police have refused to comment on what evidence had been used against Henry, or about whether additional charges were planned against her or any other persons in relation to approximately three dozen suspicious fires this semester on campus.

Director of Public Safety Gerald O'Neil yesterday said Henry would not be allowed to immediately return to Crampton Dormitory, while Director of Housing Services Joseph Zannini refused to speculate on Henry's Resident Assistant position, as he is "not sure of her status with the University."

Thelma Griffith Johnson, director of affirmative action for the University, said police officers came to Crampton around 5 p.m. Friday and asked Henry to come with them to the University police station for questioning. She was arrested at 8 p.m. on a warrant issued by Dugan, according to police.

However, only hours after Henry's arrest, another fire was reported set to a third floor bulletin board in Cance Dormitory, in the Southwest Residential Area.

Johnson, who termed Henry a "very genteel young woman," said that upon arriving at the police station Friday night she "could hear her crying." Johnson said she requested Henry be allowed to contact her mother in Philadelphia, and then called Legal Services Office attorney Charles DiMare, who arrived later to serve as Henry's counsel.

Lie detectors may be used in investigation

By JOHN O'CONNELL
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts police are considering using lie detector tests to aid in the continuing investigation of suspicious fires on campus.

Three fires have been reported on campus since Friday morning. One of those fires came after the arrest of a resident assistant Friday night.

Gerald T. O'Neil, director of public safety at UMass, said the use of polygraph lie-detector tests is "always another thing we are looking at," in the search for the people lighting fires in Crampton dormitory in the Southwest Residential Area and other dorms.

Northwestern District Attorney W. Michael Ryan, who is directing the investigation of more than 30 suspicious fires at UMass this semester, said the tests may not be considered admissable evidence in a trial.

"You can't use a polygraph against someone in court except under very constricted circumstances," he said.

Both O'Neil and Ryan said the investigation is continuing after the arrest Friday of Crampton residential assistant Yvette I. Henry charging her with one of the fires. Neither man would say if Henry is one of the three suspects the district attorney's office announced last week were being sought in connection with 16 suspicious fires in Crampton this semester, or if there are any definite suspects now.

"We follow all leads," O'Neil said. "We can't give out too much information for fear that you might prejudice people who might be sitting on the jury."

Chancellor Joseph Duffey said during a press conference Friday that the FBI has been called in to help with the investigation.

Fire investigators have enlisted the FBI for their "expertise in identifying the psychological profile of an individual who may indulge in this kind of behavior," Duffey said.

Ryan said the FBI "mainly provided us with advice and direction" in Henry's arrest. FBI agents have also offered to perform tests on "charred remains" of fires, and "analysis of any materials," he said.

A paper was reported burning on a bulletin board at 1:40 a.m. Saturday in Cance Dormitory in Southwest, University spokesman Arthur Clifford said, and two fires were reported in Coolidge Tower in Southwest Friday.

A fire outside a door on the fifth floor of Coolidge was reported at 3:40 a.m. by a 22nd floor resident who smelled smoke in the elevator shaft, Clifford said. The fire, which appeared to be lit with newspapers and burned the carpet outside the door, was "a minor fire, but it was obviously lit by someone," Clifford said, and "could have had the potential for damage."

The remains of a poster fire were discovered during a floor-by-floor check of the building conducted Friday afternoon, Clifford said.

All three fires were extinguished before firefighters arrived, and there were no injuries, he said.

Snow causes quite a flurry

By JIM FINKLE

Hundreds of University of Massachusetts students joined an all-campus snowball fight that began early Sunday afternoon in the Southwest Area and ended later in the day with an assault against Amherst College.

"It was good, clean fun that binds the east and west sides of campus," Southwest Area Government co-President David McCarthy said Sunday.

"They came up between Field and Webster and started whaling on the balconies," said Michael Altneu, Orchard Hill Area Government co-president and Dickinson dormitory student security coordinator. "Of course, people came out on the balconies and started to fight back."

According to Brad Price, a sophomore business student from MacKimmie dormitory, a group of 100 Southwest students travelled to the Central area before assaulting Orchard Hill.

"We weren't attacking, we were just having a snowball fight," he said.

"I think it is very dangerous," Altneu said. "Someone can get seriously hurt. It was all Southwest-provoked. Snowballs were aimed at people on the balconies."

"If damage was done, I think it was deplorable," McCarthy said. "If you are using slush-type snow, you are dealing with a weapon. If you are using light snow, I see the potential for damage to be less."

According to Altneu and students participating in the adventure, no one was seriously injured.

Altneu said, however, he called the UMass Police because he feared somebody might get hurt.

"There is not really much we can do," UMass Officer Thomas Bernaski said. "The students have to have some way to work off tension. It's a big country. If you are going to have snowball fight, then have a snowball fight."

Two men charged with rape

University of Massachusetts police arrested two men Saturday night in connection with a rape, a UMass spokesman reported Sunday.

UMass Director of the Office of Public Information Arthur Clifford said one of the men, a visitor to the campus, was charged with rape, and the other, a University student, was charged with attempted rape.

Clifford said UMass police refused to release any more information on the incident.

Druse gunners kill 8 Marines

BEIRUT, Lebanon (AP) — Druse gunners blasted the U.S. Marine base at the Beirut airport with rockets and artillery shells Sunday night, killing eight Marines and wounding two, a Marine spokesman reported.

Maj. Dennis Brooks said the Marines came under intense fire about 12 hours after Syrian anti-aircraft batteries shot down two U.S. Navy jets that were among 28 warplanes that launched the first American air strike in Lebanon.

The Pentagon said a two-man A-6 and a single-pilot A-7 fighter-bomber were downed when the planes attacked Syrian positions in Lebanon's central mountains about 8 a.m. (1 a.m. EST) in response to earlier attacks on U.S. reconnaissance planes.

One flier was rescued, at least one was captured and Syrian soldiers said a third died of injuries.

U.S. Navy warships opened fire on the Druse positions in the mountains overlooking the Marine base and the thunder from their heavy guns rattled buildings in Beirut.

Brooks said the Druse militiamen began spraying the southern end of the Marine encampment with small arms and 23mm anti-aircraft fire at about 7 p.m. p.m. (12 noon EST) and soon "the entire airport perimeter" was being shelled.

The naval gunfire "was the result of heavy, sustained artillery, rocket, small-arms and mortar fire that the Marine positions have been under," Brooks said.

He said the Marines "opened up with everything we have," including 155mm artillery, M-60 tanks, heavy machine guns and small arms.

The shelling of the Marine encampment ended 4¼ hours later, Brooks said.

ORDERS BOMBINGS — President Reagan speaks with reporters Sunday after returning from Camp David, Md., where he and his wife Nancy spent the weekend. Reagan vowed "to defend our forces" and ordered air strikes against Syrian gunners.

The deaths of the Marines brought to 254 the number of American servicemen killed in Lebanon, including 239 who perished in a suicide truck-bombing of the Marine headquarters on Oct. 23.

A Defense Department spokesman in Washington said names of the latest victims would not be released pending notification of relatives.

About 1,500 Marines are stationed here as part of a multinational peacekeeping force that also includes British, French and Italian troops.

In Washington, White House national security spokesman Robert Sims said, "I know we've had an attack from Druse and probably Shiite positions around the airport at Beirut and it is pretty intense. We have had some casualties and we have responded with tank and naval gunfire."

White House spokeswoman Sheila Dixon said President Reagan had been briefed about the development.

Syrians down two US planes

BEIRUT, Lebanon (AP) — Syrian forces shot down two U.S. warplanes Sunday during the first American air strike in Lebanon. One flier was rescued, at least one was captured and Syrian soldiers said a third died of injuries.

The Pentagon said a two-man A-6 and a single-pilot A-7 fighter-bomber were downed when 28 U.S. planes attacked Syrian positions in Lebanon's central mountains at about 8 a.m. 1 a.m. EST in response to earlier attacks on U.S. recoannaissance planes.

The White House said President Reagan authorized the raid. Reagan vowed to order more strikes if Syrian anti-aircraft batteries continue to fire at American surveillance planes.

"We are going to defend our forces there," Reagan told reporters at the White House. "...If our forces are attacked, we will respond."

Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger said the Syrians were believed to be holding two of the fliers. "We are attempting to negotiate their release," Reagan said.

But a Lebanese photographer on assignment for the Associated Press said he saw a captured American at one crash site, as well as another severely injured crewman taken away by Syrian soldiers. The Syrians later told reporters one American died of his injuries.

A Syrian communique mentioned only one pilot held.

The other U.S. planes returned safely to the aircraft carriers USS Independence and USS Kennedy off the Lebanese coast, the Defense Department said.

Union urges strike's end

WASHINGTON (AP) — Union leaders are expected to push hard for ratification of a contract agreement aimed at ending a bitter, month-long strike against Greyhound Lines, although one union official acknowledged "we bit the bullet" on wage concessions.

After two days of make-or-break bargaining, the Amalgamated Transit Union and Greyhound reached a tentative settlement on a new contract, with a ratification vote planned before December 20, according to federal mediators.

But union sources acknowledged the agreement contained major concessions, including a 7.8 percent wage cut — the same amount rejected earlier by a union vote — and a commitment by the employees to assume from the company a 4 percent payment into the pension plan.

"We felt that we went as far as we could go," one member of the union's bargaining council said, insisting on anonymity. He added: "We bit the bullet hard on the economic issues" but kept major work rules and won assurances that striking workers would return to their old jobs with seniority intact.

Astronaut talks to Jordan's king

SPACE CENTER, Houston (AP) — After talking by radio to the king of Jordan, a "happy bunch" of handyman astronauts used a makeshift darkroom inside a bedroll to fix a jammed camera Sunday, then repaired and fired up a twicebroken furnace.

Spacelab scientist Owen Garriott reached fellow ham radio buff King Hussein, who told him, "We're very, very, proud of you, and we share this pride with all the people of America, all the people of the world."

Bob Parker and Ulf Merbold of the Red Team — one astronaut shift — and Garriott and Byron Lichtenberg of the Blue Team got out tools and instructions Sunday to repair a series of broken experiments aboard their orbiting Spacelab. Then they charged on with the nonstop experimentation they have kept up since Spacelab was launched with space shuttle Columbia last Monday.

Billy Martin unemployed again

NASHVILLE, Tenn. (AP) — Billy Martin's third stint as manager of the New York Yankees has come to an end, a source close to the club said Sunday.

It was also reported that Dr. Bobby Brown, a former Yankees infielder and now a cardiologist, would be the new American League president.

Martin's firing, the source for that story said, would be announced at baseball's winter meetings here by owner George Steinbrenner on Tuesday, at which time Yogi Berra would be named Martin's replacement.

The source said Steinbrenner made the move "to make the players happy."

The meetings open officially on Monday with many club executives promising a more lively gathering than in past years, which have seen steadily diminishing activity in player transactions.

Tornadoes kill 8 in the south

The latest in a series of strong snowstorms blew through the Rockies on Sunday, dumping up to 21 inches of snow, while snow and ice made travel hazardous in the Northeast and the South started to dry out after waves of thunderstorms that produced floods and tornadoes.

At least three people were killed by the flooding and tornadoes, and the storm in the West was blamed for three deaths, bringing the death toll from a series of storms since Nov. 21 to 89.

By Sunday morning 26 inches of snow had fallen at Norden, Nev., and the wind gusted to more than 80 mph at Henderson, Nev., south of Las Vegas. About 30 inches of new snow fell at the Sundance ski resort in Utah, and a total of 102 inches covered the ground at Powder Mountain, the National Weather Service reported.

Winter storm warnings also were posted over much of the Northeast from Pennsylvania into New England as snow, sleet and freezing rain moved up from the Ohio Valley. Watertown, N.Y., got 7 inches of snow and Rochester had 6 inches. Fort Dix, N.J., got 1.16 inches of rain.

Schultz leaves for NATO meeting

WASHINGTON (AP) — Secretary of State George P. Shultz leaves Tuesday for Europe for talks with the NATO allies that will focus on EastWest relations, including the new missile rivalry and the possibility of a meeting with Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko.

Shultz will go first to Bonn to meet with West German leaders and move on to Brussels where NATO foreign ministers begin a two-day meeting Wednesday. He plans later stops in Tunisia, Morocco and Portugal before returning to the United States on Dec. 13.

UMass alumnus speaks on unions

By BROOKE STATES
Collegian Staff

Advising business on how to combat unions has become big business in the past several years. Now a group called Corporate Campaign, Incorporated is showing unions how to fight companies with new strategies and concepts.

Ray Rodgers, a 1967 graduate of the University of Massachusetts and founder of Corporate Campaign spoke to 30 people in Memorial Hall Sunday night.

Rodgers used a slide show to present a strategy where pressure was brought against stockholders, creditors, banks, insurance companies, and other behind-the-scenes controllers of whatever target company a union might be struggling against.

"The overriding issue which should be raised to the highest levels of public and political debate, but never is, is who controls the flow of the huge concentrations of money and for what ends," Rodgers said.

"The 50 largest commercial banks have 1 trillion dollars in assets and 800 billion dollars in deposits. The three largest insurance companies, Metropolitan, Equitable, and New York Life, have connections with 171 out of the 200 leaders of the Business Roundtable," he said. "They get the power because they control the flow of money, they undermine democracy and decide whether to build or destroy regional economies. The only control they have is the power of money and what it can do. They have to be held accountable and we have to have a mechanism to confront power with power. City Bank has 130 billion in assets which is more control then most Governments."

Rodgers furst developed his strategy while working for the Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers (ACTWU), which was trying to unionize the workers of the JP Stevens Textile Company.

By researching Stevens links to other companies such as Metropolitan Life, Rodgers says he helped trigger internal corporate power struggles which helped the ACTWU become recognized by Stevens.

The ACTWU had been trying for 17 years to unionize the Stevens Workforce.

Rodgers and his ten peers on Corporate Campaign staff have six major strategies. As an example: If the president of Company Y sits on the board of bank Z, and they have a dispute with Union X, Rodgers finds out what pressure the union can put on the bank, through, for instance, the withdrawal of pension funds. Rodgers also helps unions work with community groups and gets coalitions to buy stock in companies that are involved in labor disputes so that they can vote an attempt to use influence within the companies.

WOMEN'S FORUM

Women's Forum is a weekly listing of upcoming events relating to women's issues. Notices should be sent to the Women's Issues Editors, care of the Collegian, 113 Campus Center, before the Friday preceding the event.

There are two hotlines available on campus for aid to victims of rape or other violence. The 24-Hour Rape Hotline is 545-2677. The Everywoman's Center Hotline for victims of violence is 545-0800.

Monday — Willesse Comissiong will speak on "Domesticity and Economic Solvency" at 12:30 p.m. in room 162, Campus Center.

The Anti-Racism Team will meet at 4 p.m. in room 801, Campus Center.

Geraldine Crisci, Project Director of the Personal Safety Program will speak on child sexual abuse, its treatment and prevention at 7 p.m. The lecture is sponsored by the Council of Undergraduate Students in Pyschology and will be held in room 904, Campus Center.

There will be a "speak-out" on violence against women in the dormitories at 7 p.m. in Skinner Hall Auditorium. There will be a karate demonstration and a panel of speakers. All university women and men are invited to attend.

Tuesday — The Women's Issues Team will meet at 4 p.m. in room 803, Campus Center.

Thursday — 'La Operacion,' a film about sterilization abuse will be shown at 12 p.m. in room 903, Campus Center. Panna Putnam of the Everywoman's Center will speak.

"Not a Love Story," a film about pornography will be shown at 7 p.m. in room 134, Hasabrouck.

Speak-out on violence to be held tonight

By RITA MURPHY
Collegian Staff

Angela Giudice did not want to organize just a forum on violence against women which students could attend and listen to. She wanted students to be the ones doing the talking in the hopes that others would listen.

As special projects coordinator for the Northeast/Sylvan Residential Areas at the University of Massachusetts, Giudice is one of many people responsible for organizing a "Speak-out on violence against women," to be held tonight from 7 to 10 p.m. in Skinner Hall auditorium.

"In my 10 years here, I've seen many events done for ourselves which few students feel part of," Guidice said. "We wanted to do something to really reach students."

Speak-outs were popular open forums on college campuses during the late 1960's and early 1970's. The last speak-out on violence against women at UMass was in 1976, when women gathered to express the fears and anger at acts of violence against women, particularly rape.

Tonight's discussion does not have an agenda. While rape will undoubtedly be discussed, other forms of violence, such as beatings from boyfriends, the psychological affects of incest, sexual harassment and abuse will probably be touched upon, she said.

"More than just focusing on the incidents though, we want to try and focus on what we can do about it," she said.

One thing women can do about violence is help each other not feel isolated. By coming together, women can offer support to other women, she said.

"If women can walk out of a speak-out not feeling alone and isolated, then it will be a success," she said.

Third World reps attend conference

By YADIRA BETANCES
Collegian Staff

More than 100 Third World students from colleges and universities in Massachusetts, Vermont and Connecticut attended the fifth annual New England Third World student leadership conference held at the University of Massachusetts Saturday.

The conference was held to bring Third World students from different institutions in New England together to share ideas on improving education outside the classrooms.

Started in fall, 1981 at the University of Connecticut, the conference was born out of the outgrowth of student activities. Its initial purpose was to develop enrichment programs to combine informal and formal education, according to Kevin Hatton, co-coordinator from Greater Hartford Community College.

Leading the introduction, Chancellor Joseph D. Duffey said Third World students were "privileged" because of the resources UMass holds for them like the bound papers of W. E. B. DuBois.

"We recruited you, but you have to be successful. You have to survive," he said.

Duffey said he believes the university has done better than the years before, in terms of providing financial support for Third World organizations. "The University is trying to bridge the education gap," he said. He said he hopes students attending the University can also get involved in social programs.

Keynote speaker James Baldwin, renowned author and visiting five college literature professor, focused on the education blacks receive in predominantly white educational institutions.

"There has been no America for us," Baldwin said. "It is very difficult to pledge allegiance to a country that can't pledge allegiance to you," Baldwin said.

Men's center in Brett gives peer counseling, support

By JOHN YONCE
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts may have a full-time men's center to provide a place where students can discuss men's issues and receive peer counseling.

"Still in the planning stages," the center, located in Brett dormitory, is now open Wednesday nights according to Hugh Grogan, a center organizer. Grogan said he and other organizers would like to see the center operating on a full-time basis by spring, with added services and programs.

The center provides services "somewhat similar to the women's center," Grogan said, including peer counseling, a resource center, and support groups.

While there have been previous unsuccessful attempts to organize a men's center, Grogan is optimistic of this one's chance for success. "The timing is really good, people are talking about the issues that (we confront)," he said.

"Lots of men don't feel that they can communicate with each other (men) as friends, and we hope we can validate that," he said.

"Men are getting confused, in a sense...the women's movement, the civil rights movement, gay rights, these have all prompted men to take a look at themselves and explore who they are and what they want," he said.

Grogan said that while the center will be "pro-feminist and anti-sexist," he said he is reluctant to label it.

"It's important to take political stances, but more important is to encourage dialogue between people about what's going on," he said.

"Lots of men don't feel that they can communicate with each other as friends, and we hope we can validate that."

Men's Center Organizer

Not yet a Registered Student Organization, the center is funded through the East Side Residential Education Office, Grogan said.

The center, which is handicapped accessible, is located in 126 Brett dormitory, in the Central Residential area. While it is not yet open full time, the center holds meetings every Wednesday from 4 to 5 p.m. and encourages everyone to attend, with no obligation, Grogan said.

Speakers address Puerto Rican independence

Activists assail grand juries

By CAMDEN PIERCE
Collegian Staff

The United States government uses the grand jury system to discredit and destroy the Puerto Rican independence movement, according to two activists who spoke Saturday at the University of Massachusetts.

Julio Rosado and Shelly Miller — the former leader in the National Liberation Movement in Puerto Rico, the latter a non-Puerto Rican member of the New Movement in Solidarity with Puerto Rican Independence and Socialism — said they face prison sentences for criminal contempt after refusing to testify before a New York grand jury formed to investigate bombings in New York City last New Years Day.

Miller said she and another woman face a January trial date.

"I assume we'll be convicted and probably be sent to prison for three years," she said, adding that three year sentences seem to have become the rule in such cases.

Miller said hers is the first case of criminal contempt charges against North American political activists.

In the past, the government has used the civil contempt charge against political activists.

Civil contempt is a coercive measure, and imprisons a witness who refuses to testify before a grand jury for the duration of the jury: a maximum of 18 months. Criminal contempt is a punitive measure, and there is no theoretical limit to the period of time a person convicted of the crime could be sentenced to serve.

Grand juries are being used to "selectively strike out...at key people in the structural apparatus of the movement," said Rosado, who has already been sentenced to three years in prison, but who is now free pending appeal of his conviction.

Using the grand jury's power of subpoena "as a weapon of intimidation," the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) hopes to remove leaders from the movement, Rosado said.

"The grand jury offers the government of the U.S. an apparatus rooted in the legal system of this country. And therefore, while it serves as an apparatus of repression, it is also an apparatus that is very well disguised," he said.

"The grand jury offers the government of the U.S. an apparatus rooted in the legal system of this country. And therefore, while it serves as an apparatus of repression, it is an apparatus that is very well disguised."

—Julio Rosado
National Liberation Movement

The motivation of the U.S. government, in continually trying to keep a legitimate Puerto Rican independence movement off-balance, is continued dominance in the Caribbean basin, Rosado said. The U.S. is supporting the current Puerto Rican government because it fears an independent government would threaten the function of a naval base already in existence, he said. A new government would also threaten the installation of a "tactical airwing base...from which the U.S. can cover the entire zone of Central America, the oil fields of Venezuala, and a major part of Mexico," Rosado said.

Refusing to be intimidated, leaders in the independence movement are taking a position of "non-collabaration," though they face imprisonment for criminal contempt, he said.

EDITORIAL/OPINION

Labor unions get the shaft

The recent clash between the Greyhound Bus Company and it's employees is another battle in the escalating struggle between working people and the large corporations of this country. For workers it is a struggle for survival, and not since the early years of the labor movement have they faced such a struggle. Not only are thousands of jobs being shipped overseas, but the practice of union busting has greatly increased in the last decade. Although it has become a sophisticated business the intent hasn't changed since the days when the Pinkertons policed the property of America's ruling class. Modern union busting methods include terrorizing workers into de-certification drives, instituting quality control circles, and most notably threats of bankruptcy as in the case of Continental Airlines. In both situations, the companies forced the rank and file to make back-breaking concessions, which resulted in dramatic cuts in pay and loss of jobs.

Paul Hetznecker

There is still another front to this crisis and that is the significant loss of jobs to technological innovation. The point being is that while all of these fronts have become losing battles, the union leadership of this country has not been able to provide their rank and file with a viable strategy to counteract this disintegration of workers power. The major part of the problem lies within the union hierarchy itself. Union leadership and company management are increasingly seeing eye to eye when it comes to restoring the economy, as evidenced by the outrageous concessions that are being made. This hasn't stopped the onslaught of union busting, but it has opened a whole new can of worms regarding the traditional class antagonism between workers and capital. Union hierarchy and the managers of industry now have a common interest which up until now put them in conflict, they both are bent on protecting their respective positions of power. While making for strange bedfellows it has left the rank and file with the short end of the stick. This is clearly exemplified in the auto industry where the president of the United Auto Workers sits on the board of Chrysler, agreeing to the lay off of thousands of workers while the company goes ahead with its plans to build a plant equipped with robots in place of humans.

Despite losing battles, the result of bureaucratic self interest, conciliation, or lack of imagination on the part of union hierarchy, the rank and file workers themselves are in greater frequency finding their own solutions. In 1981, under similar circumstances as the ones faced by the CWA this summer, workers in a key communications network owned by GTE in British Columbia, Canada took a page out of history and went on a sit down strike. For six days the workers controlled and operated over twenty installations over an area as large as California, Oregon and Washington combined. Not only did the occupations force the company to come to terms with the workers but it created a very exciting situation of collective decision making and workers control. With the recent acquisition of Weirton steel plant by the workers in West Virginia and countless other examples of worker's self-management cropping up all over the country, the workers, the rank and file may be finding their own way out of this crisis. A way which may create important new democratic forms of social organization.

Paul Hetznecker is a UMass student.

Editor's note: The Greyhound management and union leadership have reached an agreement on a tentative new contract. As of press time, the contract has not been ratified by union rank and file (the workers).

Arson — we call it as we see it

Ray Beauchemin

A woman from one of the professional newspapers covering the fire situation asked what I thought about them. A staffer asked me why I wasn't getting involved (i.e., writing about the fires). Another staffer questioned the news play the incidents have received.

Questions flood my desk and the desks of my fellow Collegian editors — questions from Philadelphia, Boston, Worcester and Washington. The Inquirer, the Globe, and Kiss 108, the Evening Gazette and the Post.

Fire-plagued Crampton and Cashin and the University have become a news event; no matter what I think about the fires — whether I think they are minor incidents (Chancellor Duffey said we should put quotes around 'fire') or major incidents (Duffey also said this pathological behavior has placed the whole university community in a hostage situation) — the Collegian has a responsibility to its readership.

Collegian reporters were on the story from the beginning and did the initial wiring to Associated Press and United Press International. If the fires are a media event, it is because of experienced reporters who know what is meant when the press says it has a responsibility to inform the public. The Collegian has done a good job reporting the fires objectively. We play it as we see it, which is not to say, however, that we don't question what we do.

Editors sometimes feel forced into playing the fire as the top story questioning whether it is all that big; questioning the residents of Crampton who post bail for the woman who has been charged with two counts of burning the property of another in their dorm; questioning whether the arrest made is the arrest that should have been made: is Yvette Henry responsible for an act of arson? And when Henry is released today after bail has been posted, will she still be an R.A.? If she is not, isn't that convicting her before she gets her trial? If she is kept on as the 'floor counselor,' might that subject her fellow students to undue trauma?

And speaking of trauma...Since polygraphs are inadmissable in courts (for the most part), and since UMass officials are seriously considering use of the lie-detecting device to find the arsonist, aren't investigators this time subjecting the dorm students to more undue trauma?

And timing, on another note. How timely it was that Crampton was evacuated and an arrest was made within hours of a press conference and the reluctance of administrators to allow the press inside the dormitory that Friday afternoon? (We were finally allowed in and ushered out quickly.)

And how coincidental is it that the FBI is involved in the investigation? Is it really because of their expertise in mapping psychological profiles or does it have anything to do with the 'rumor' that one of three suspects in the fires has left the state? And when investigators said there were three suspects and now refuse to say whether or not the 'three' has changed, does that mean Henry was or was not one of the three?

I suppose there are answers to most of these questions, whether the fires stop or not. But until everything does blow over, the Collegian will proceed in the same manner as it has: this is a news event and it will be played thus.

On violence against women

In September a woman was raped outside of Butterfield dormitory. Over the course of this semester other women have been raped, beaten, sexually abused, and sexually harassed. Yet the number of reported incidents to police is surprisingly low.

Why?

When a person's car is stolen he or she reports it to the police. Anger is usually the top emotion felt.

When violence is committed against a woman, not only does she feel anger, but many times guilt, which is just as strong.

The criminal justice system prosecutes car thieves, yet very few rapists, wife beaters, or even sexual harassers are jailed.

Many times if women do take legal action against their attacker, they are not treated as victims but rather as the guilty party. As a result, women hide the crimes committed against them.

They hide the pain, the fear, the guilt.

Tonight at 7 p.m. in Skinner auditorium, there is a speak out on violence against women. The event will be an opportunity for women to stand together against violence against women.

While the speak out will not bring an end to violence against women, it will be useful in showing everyone that when violence is committed against one woman, it is committed against all women.

There are no easy solutions to the problem of violence against women, as there is not a cure for cancer. But bringing the problem out in the open will bring a solution one step closer.

Unfortunately, the problem with such events is that very few people bother to show up for them thinking their presence or lack of will not make a difference. In this case, it will make a difference. If enough women show up, their voice will be heard and the message will be clear; violence against women must stop.

The women who are there will be there to stand united against violence against women. The men who show up will show they are supportive of any and all means of helping to stop violence against women.

If 25,000 people could show up tonight, the campus would be a better place to live in tomorrow.

The murderers still continue

To the Editor,

This December 3 marked the third anniversary of the murder of four U.S. religious workers by the Salvadoran National Guard in that country. The four — Ita Ford, Maura Clarke, Jean Donovan and Dorothy Kazel — were killed by a right-wing death squad because they worked with the poor people of El Salvador. It is widely recognized and admitted — even by members of the Reagan Administration, such as ex-ambassador to El Salvador Deane Hinton, and current ambassador Pickering — that these death squads are intimately connected with the Salvadoran military.

Now it is not my intention, by remembering the murder of these four women, to slight the memory of more than 30,000 Salvadoran citizens who have been killed by the Salvadoran military in the last four years. Indeed, in a population of only several million, it might seem astounding that there are still enough "subversives" alive for the murders to continue at the rate of 200 per week. It might, until we remember that the intention is simply to terrorize the entire population, who overwhelmingly support the "leftist guerrillas."

No, my intention is not to slight the Salvadorans who have been tortured, raped and murdered at the hands of the U.S.-equipped, trained and backed Salvadoran military. Since these four U.S. citizens were murdered by the same hands, we have heard repeated threats from U.S. administration officials to the effect that continued aid is contingent on improvements in human rights and in particular on finding and bringing to justice the murderers of the religious women. Nevertheless, their murderers have not been brought to trial — neither those who pulled the triggers nor those who gave the orders — and there is no expectation they will be. Meanwhile, the aid not only continues, but grows larger and larger.

The money we need here in the U.S. for day-care centers, for health clinics, schools, housing — the wealth we produce in this country — continues to flow to those who murdered Jean Donovan, Dorothy Kazel, Maura Clarke and Ita Ford, precisely so they may continue their dirty work. The only question is: How much longer will we, in the U.S., allow this to continue?
